Testimony Prepared for the Pennsylvania State Board of Education Commenting on Proposed Amendments to Chapter 4 Regulations To Implement High Stakes Graduation Competency Assessments January 8th, 2008

Chairman Girton and members of the State Board of Education, thank you for this opportunity to provide written comments on the proposed GCA amendments to Chapter 4.

I am a third term school director in the School District of Haverford Township. I also serve as Chairman of the Delaware County School Boards Legislative Council and as Co-chairman of the Southeastern Pennsylvania School Districts Education Coalition, a regional grassroots advocacy organization with representatives from school districts in Delaware, Montgomery, Chester and Lehigh counties.

I am writing on behalf of the 15 school districts in Delaware County and the over 74,000 students we represent, to strongly urge the State Board to reconsider plans to amend Chapter 4 regulations to implement a battery of high stakes Graduation Competency Exams.

I would briefly like to provide you with the "on the ground" perspective and questions of regional administrators and school directors and present some data for your review and consideration.

As you will note on the attached spreadsheets, according to the Philadelphia Inquirer's 2007 Report Card on the Schools, 10 of the 15 school districts in Delaware County, 10 of 13 school districts in Bucks County, 21 of 25 school districts in Montgomery County and 9 of the 12 school districts in Chester County sent more than 80% of their graduating students to college last year. I have combined the college attendance data with data from the recently completed costing out study and listed it by county.

While this does not necessarily guarantee that they are well prepared for college level work or that they will finish college, they are apparently scoring well enough in their college entrance exams and are being accepted by colleges nationwide. Why are we proposing to implement a statewide "fix" to something that does not appear to be broken in many school districts? Why not focus accountability efforts and resources on those districts that need additional attention and support?

In my district, in addition to the PSSA math, reading, writing and science assessments and our routine local assessments, we are already administering the 4sight exams a few times each year, impacting instructional time on 20 days of our 184 day school year. We provide PSSA re-tests for seniors as needed and selected seniors also sit for the NAEP exam. This scenario and allocation of time is fairly representative of our school districts.

What will our successful school districts accomplish by spending even more time and money on high stakes testing and test preparation? How will it help our students to have them give up instructional time on task for additional testing and test preparation?

We also have concerns regarding the effect of GCA's on students in struggling school districts. According to a study conducted by Boston University's National Board on Educational Testing and Public Policy, results show that in schools with proportionately more students of low socioeconomic status that used high stakes minimum competency tests, early dropout rates – between the eighth and tenth grades – were 4 to 6 percentage points higher than in schools that were similar but for the high stakes test requirement.

Thanks again for your time and consideration. Please do not hesitate to contact me if we might provide any additional information.

Sincerely,
