

Independent Regulatory Review, the Honorable Senator Brubaker and the Honorable Members of the Pennsylvania House of Representatives.

The final-form regulation does not require the reduction of “ambient air temperature”, but instead requires the kennel owner to employ auxiliary ventilation and reduce the heat index to 85 HI, through the use of humidity reduction, when temperatures within the kennel and kennel housing facility rise above 85 degrees Fahrenheit. There is scientific evidence – related to heat studies and heat index values – which support the humidity requirements set forth in the final-form regulations. The attached heat index charts for various species of animals, including humans, evidences that 85 degrees Fahrenheit is where the danger zone begins. A heat index value of 85 HI or less will protect the health and welfare of dogs and other animals. Dogs, other than healthy, short haired breeds, can not survive heat index values in excess of 95-98 HI for more than six hours (See Exhibit C). The final-form regulation sets standards for humidity based on heat index values and the regulation of humidity levels.

With regard to the general humidity standard established by the final-form regulation of 30%-70% when temperatures in a kennel housing facility are under 85 degrees Fahrenheit that standard is supported by, the standards established by the United States Department of Agriculture in the Animal Welfare Act regulations (9 CFR § 1.1), which establishes a humidity range of 30-70% as a standard for animals housed in an indoor housing facility. In addition, the Department, consulted with animal scientists from the Pennsylvania State University and veterinarians from the Department and the Canine Health Board, along with additional conversations with engineers (Learned Design and Paragon Engineering Services) that design and build kennel housing facilities. Those consultations confirmed that a broad humidity range of 30-70% is appropriate and constitutes normal animal husbandry practices for animals, including dogs, when temperatures are between 50 degrees Fahrenheit and 85 degrees Fahrenheit.

Concerning the humidity levels when temperatures are greater than 85 degrees Fahrenheit, the Department, with the assistance of consultations with the engineers listed above, Department and Canine Health Board veterinarians and research provided by Dr. Overall of the Canine Health Board, reviewed heat index values for cattle, swine, poultry and humans. Those values show that all of those animals are in a danger zone once temperatures rise above 85 degrees Fahrenheit, if there is no correlated reduction in humidity levels. The reason for this is supported by the physiology of cooling. Humans, cattle, equine and swine cool internal body temperatures by perspiring, which is the most efficient cooling mechanism. Dogs cool their internal body temperatures mostly through panting, with a minimum amount of cooling provided by perspiring through the pads on their feet. However, perspiring or panting in and of itself does not result in the cooling of the body. In order for the cooling effect to occur the perspiration or moisture, whether it be a human, swine or cow or on the tongue of the dog, has to be evaporated. On a humid day or in a humid environment there is already a lot of moisture in the air and therefore the evaporative process is either less efficient or does not take place and the internal body temperature continues to rise. In sum, you can not provide a cooling effect by simply increasing the amount of humid air flowing over the body of a dog or any other animal. Pulling already moist and humid air over the body does not and will not allow for the evaporation of perspiration and therefore will not provide a cooling of the body. The result is that when temperatures rise above 85 degrees, humidity levels must be controlled in order to attain a heat index value that will assure the health, safety and welfare of dogs confined in kennels. The heat index values referred to earlier, and attached hereto as Exhibit B, all evidence that value should be set at a heat index of 85 (85 HI).

Finally the Department with the assistance of Canine Health Board member Dr. Karen Overall found - and along with Department veterinarians reviewed - a dog study that established "survivability" levels for confined dogs. The study, which is attached hereto as Exhibit C, sets forth evidence that beagle dogs can not survive for more than six hours at maximum heat index values of between 100-106 degrees Fahrenheit. The study goes further, to conclude the relative humidity values in the study should be reduced by twenty percent (20%) to assure safety. The final-form regulation therefore allows a 4 hour window (consistent with Federal Animal Welfare regulations standards) for kennel owners to reduce the humidity levels in their kennels to attain the required heat index value of 85 (85 HI). However, during that 4 hour window, the heat index value must never go above 90 (90 HI), which is the maximum heat index value to ensure survivability and safety, the latter requiring the recommended 20% reduction in humidity levels from the study's maximum values of 95-98 HI, and consideration of the TACC Weather Safety Scale.

- In short, the Department consulted with the engineers to assure the humidity levels and ventilation levels contained in the final-form regulation are attainable. The consensus was such levels are attainable and the regulatory analysis form accompanying the final-form regulation sets forth the cost of design and installation of a system that would allow compliance with the established standards. The Department has the absolute authority and the duty to regulate ventilation and humidity in such a manner as to protect and assure the health and welfare of the dogs housed in commercial kennels. Therefore, the final-form regulations set very precise humidity levels and auxiliary ventilation measures to be employed in the kennel housing facility when temperatures inside the kennel go above 85 degrees Fahrenheit. These measures are attainable and based on scientific studies related to dog survivability and safety and heat index values established for other animals such as swine, cattle, poultry and humans. These animals cool themselves more efficiently than dogs, therefore, following those standards certainly set a minimum level for dog health and it can not be reasonably argued the standards are too extreme or burdensome. Instead, the standards simply set a base level of animal husbandry practices, based on expert advice and scientific standards, which must be adhered to in order to assure dog health in commercial kennels.

3. The Department appreciates the support expressed by the commentator, but notes that changes, including mimicking the language of the statute which allows either natural or artificial light.

In addition, as set forth previously, the level of light provided has been modified in the final-form regulation. The Department, with the assistance of members of the Canine Health Board and Department veterinarians did additional research into the issue of the proper illumination levels in kennels. In addition, the Department spoke with animal husbandry scientists at the Pennsylvania State University and with engineers (Learned Design and Paragon Engineering Services) who designs kennel buildings. The consensus was that forty to sixty (40-60) foot candles of light is necessary to assure proper animal husbandry practices, including the ability to monitor the dogs, assure sanitation and cleanliness of the kennel (compliance with statutory and regulatory standards) and provide for the proper health and welfare of the dogs. In addition, the Department researched and reviewed the National Institutes of Health (NIH), policies and guidelines related to biomedical and animal research facility design. The NIH requires average lighting levels in animal facilities to be between twenty-five to seventy-five (25-75) footcandles, which translates to two-hundred seventy to eight-hundred (279-800) lux. The guidelines state the exact lighting levels should be based on species.

The veterinarians and animal husbandry scientists consulted felt the range of 40-60 footcandles, which translates to 430-650 lux, was appropriate for both the dogs and the humans that had to care for those dogs. This level is further supported by the NIH standards for office and administration areas and Penn State University's standards for class room lighting, which are also 50 footcandles (as set forth in Dr. Kephart's comments). This level will provide for the health and welfare needs of the dogs housed in the facilities and will allow for proper inspection of the facilities and animal husbandry practices, such as cleaning and sanitizing and monitoring the dogs for health issues. The NIH standards are attached to this document as Exhibit D.

With regard to the nighttime lighting standard, although removed from the final-form regulation, it was not an arbitrary standard. The standard was based on research that showed dogs need 1-5 footcandles of light in order to allow for their normal startle response. Complete darkness is not optimal for dogs.

4. The Department appreciates the support expressed by the commentator. At the recommendation of the Independent Regulatory Review Commission, the Department has added language to the final-form regulation that sets forth the general flooring parameters of the statute. In addition, the Department, following many of the standards established by the Canine Health Board in the Guidelines, has established provisions that must be met in order for optional flooring to be approved.

Comment: General Support

I am writing to voice my support for the new commercial kennel regulations that have been proposed by the Canine Health Board. I hope they will be approved and implemented as soon as possible in order to protect dogs.

RESPONSE

The Department appreciates the support of this commentator. The final-form regulation drafted by the Department, as required by the Dog Law, sets very specific ventilation, auxiliary ventilation, humidity, ammonia, lighting and flooring standards for dogs housed in commercial kennels.

The Department has made substantive changes to the final-form regulation, including deleting and restructuring language that was in the proposed regulation, which the Department believes may have either been outside the statutory authority granted by the statute or was unclear or too subjective in nature. A majority of the overall changes made to the final-form regulations were based upon the comments and the input received during the rulemaking process. As stated previously, the Department has taken the comments and concerns expressed in all of the submitted comments very seriously. This should be evident in the responses to the comments and in the language of the final-form regulation. As stated in answers to similar comments from other commentators, the Department scrutinized all of the comments, consulted with engineers, architects, Departmental and Canine Health Board veterinarians, experts in auxiliary ventilation utilized in kennels, members of a commercial kennel group and did its own additional research in order to assure the final-form regulation meets the mandates of the Act. The final-form regulation is intended to and does set standards that are within the scope of authority granted by the Act and that meet the Department's statutory duty to protect the health and welfare of the dogs housed in commercial kennels. The final-form regulation is drafted in a manner – breaking the regulation into sections that set standards for the specific provisions required to be addressed by the regulation - intended to provide additional clarity and contains language and standards that are objective and measurable.

The Department, under the constraints of the statute, has endeavored to draft a final-form regulation that comports with the statutory mandates and still establishes ventilation, auxiliary ventilation, humidity, ammonia level, lighting and flooring standards that protect the health and welfare of dogs housed in commercial kennels. In doing so, the Department contacted and consulted with many of the engineers, architects, animal scientists that commented on the proposed regulation. The Department also consulted veterinarians from the Canine Health Board and Department veterinarians with regard to the final standards established in the final-form regulation. The standards in the final-form regulation are within the statutory mandate of the Act, are objective and measurable and will be enforceable.

The final-form regulations establish a basic level of care that is within the authority of the parameters of sections 207(h)(6)(7)(8) and 221(f) of the Dog Law and which are based on input and consultations with experts such as engineers and architects who design and build kennel facilities, animal scientists and veterinarians from the Canine Health Board and the Department.

The final-form regulation is drafted to comply with not only the authority, but the duty imposed by the statute and the Pennsylvania General Assembly. The final-form regulation is within the statutory authority imposed by the Act and carries out the duty to assure that ventilation, auxiliary ventilation, humidity, ammonia, lighting and alternative flooring standards in commercial kennels are based on animal husbandry practices and account for the health and welfare of dogs housed in commercial kennels.

Comments: Specific

I support the proposed regulations because they will:

1. Implement new standards to provide auxiliary ventilation so that the temperature does not exceed 85 degrees. Currently under state law there is no requirement and this leads to dogs suffering in intolerable heat during the summer months. There will be a minimum temperature of 50 degrees.
2. Require that solid floors are used in all commercial kennels, replacing the cruel wire floors that can be used today and constantly cause debilitating injuries to dogs.
3. Implement ventilation requirements that will ensure that fresh air is continually passed throughout the kennels to reduce disease.

RESPONSES

1. The Department no longer sets a temperature cap in the final-form regulation. While the Department believes that such a cap would be consistent with the Animal Welfare Act regulations, which set a temperature cap of 85 degree Fahrenheit, the language of the statute and comments from the Office of Attorney General and members of the Senate and House Agricultural and Rural Affairs Committees have led the Department to utilize humidity levels, which it has absolute authority to establish, to control the kennel environment.

Although not enforced by the Department some kennels, regulated by the Federal Animal Welfare Act, will still have to achieve temperature reduction to meet the Federal standards. The Federal Code of Regulations, which would apply to kennels selling dogs at wholesale, at sections 3.2 and 3.3 establish even more stringent standards, which absolutely require temperature reductions within the kennel facility to 85 degrees Fahrenheit (with a 4 hour window). Many of the kennels affected by the commercial kennel standards and these regulations must also comply with the Federal Code of Regulations.

That said, the final-form regulations no longer sets a temperature cap of 86 degrees Fahrenheit, nor does it require a reduction in the ambient air temperature in the kennel housing facility. Since the Department's authority to require air temperature reduction under the provisions of the Pennsylvania Dog Law has been questioned by the Office of Attorney General, and it has been asserted by the General Assembly and the Independent Regulatory Review Commission, that the Department can not require air temperature within a kennel or kennel housing facility to be reduced to or held at 85 degrees Fahrenheit there is no such set standard in the final-form regulation. With regard to standards once temperatures inside the kennel housing facility rise above 85 degrees Fahrenheit, the Department does not set a temperature cap or requirement. The Department explains its regulatory approach and the reasons for that regulatory approach in previous responses to similar comments from numerous commentators, including the Independent Regulatory Review, the Honorable Senator Brubaker and the Honorable Members of the Pennsylvania House of Representatives.

The final-form regulation does not require the reduction of "ambient air temperature", but instead requires the kennel owner to employ auxiliary ventilation and reduce the heat index to 85 HI, through the use of humidity reduction, when temperatures within the kennel and kennel housing facility rise above 85 degrees Fahrenheit. There is scientific evidence – related to heat studies and heat index values – which support the humidity requirements set forth in the final-form regulations. The attached heat index charts for various species of animals, including humans, evidences that 85 degrees Fahrenheit is where the danger zone begins. A heat index value of 85 HI or less will protect the health and welfare of dogs and other animals. Dogs, other than healthy, short haired breeds, can not survive heat index values in excess of 95-98 HI for more than six hours (See Exhibit C). The final-form regulation sets standards for humidity based on heat index values and the regulation of humidity levels.

With regard to the general humidity standard established by the final-form regulation of 30%-70% when temperatures in a kennel housing facility are under 85 degrees Fahrenheit that standard is supported by, the standards established by the United States Department of Agriculture in the Animal Welfare Act regulations (9 CFR § 1.1), which establishes a humidity range of 30-70% as a standard for animals housed in an indoor housing facility. In addition, the Department, consulted with animal scientists from the Pennsylvania State University and veterinarians from the Department and the Canine Health Board, along with additional conversations with engineers (Learned Design and Paragon Engineering Services) that design and build kennel housing facilities. Those consultations confirmed that a broad humidity range of 30-70% is appropriate and constitutes normal animal husbandry practices for animals, including dogs, when temperatures are between 50 degrees Fahrenheit and 85 degrees Fahrenheit.

With regard to the humidity levels when temperatures are greater than 85 degrees Fahrenheit, the Department, with the assistance of consultations with the engineers listed above, Department and Canine Health Board veterinarians and research provided by Dr. Overall of the Canine Health Board, reviewed heat index values for cattle, swine, poultry and humans. Those values show that all of those animals are in a danger zone once temperatures rise above 85 degrees Fahrenheit, if there is no correlated reduction in humidity levels. The reason for this is supported by the physiology of cooling. Humans, cattle, equine and swine cool internal body temperatures by perspiring, which is the most efficient cooling mechanism. Dogs cool their internal body temperatures mostly through panting, with a minimum amount of cooling provided by perspiring through the pads on their feet. However, perspiring or panting in and of itself does not result in the cooling of the body. In order for the cooling effect to occur the perspiration or moisture, whether it be a human, swine or cow or on the tongue of the dog, has to be evaporated. On a humid day or in a humid environment there is already a lot of moisture in the air and therefore the evaporative process is either less efficient or does not take place and the internal body temperature continues to rise. In sum, you can not provide a cooling effect by simply increasing the amount of humid air flowing over the body of a dog or any other animal. Pulling already moist and humid air over the body does not and will not allow for the evaporation of perspiration and therefore will not provide a cooling of the body. The result is that when temperatures rise above 85 degrees, humidity levels must be controlled in order to attain a heat index value that will assure the health, safety and welfare of dogs confined in kennels. The heat index values referred to earlier, and attached hereto as Exhibit B, all evidence that value should be set at a heat index of 85 (85 HI).

Finally the Department with the assistance of Canine Health Board member Dr. Karen Overall found - and along with Department veterinarians reviewed - a dog study that established "survivability" levels for confined dogs. The study, which is attached hereto as Exhibit C, sets forth evidence that beagle dogs can not survive for more than six hours at maximum heat index values of between 100-106 degrees Fahrenheit. The study goes further, to conclude the relative humidity values in the study should be reduced by twenty percent (20%) to assure safety. The final-form regulation therefore allows a 4 hour window (consistent with Federal Animal Welfare regulations standards) for kennel owners to reduce the humidity levels in their kennels to attain the required heat index value of 85 (85 HI). However, during that 4 hour window, the heat index value must never go above 90 (90 HI), which is the maximum heat index value - with the recommended 20% reduction in humidity levels - under which dogs confined in the kennels can survive.

With regard to ventilation standards, not only does the final-form regulation do away with air exchanges per hour and change to a more objective and defined standard of cubic feet per minute per dog, but the final-form regulation no longer requires 100% fresh air exchange. It now provides that a minimum of 30 cubic feet per minute per dog must be fresh air and the rest of the air may be re-circulated in the kennel housing facility. These standards will make the system easier to design and install, easier to assure compliance and less expensive to operate because a majority of the air can be re-circulated and the amount of air circulation is based on kennel volume and number of dogs.

In short, the Department consulted with the engineers to assure the humidity levels and ventilation levels contained in the final-form regulation are attainable. The consensus was such levels are attainable and the regulatory analysis form accompanying the final-form regulation sets forth the cost of design and installation of a system that would allow compliance with the established standards. The Department has the absolute authority and the duty to regulate ventilation and humidity in such a manner as to protect and assure the health and welfare of the dogs housed in commercial kennels. Therefore, the final-form regulations set very precise humidity levels and auxiliary ventilation measures to be employed in the kennel housing facility when temperatures inside the kennel go above 85 degrees Fahrenheit. These measures are attainable and based on scientific studies related to dog survivability and safety and heat index values established for other animals such as swine, cattle, poultry and humans. These animals cool themselves more efficiently than dogs, therefore, following those standards certainly set a minimum level for dog health and it can not be reasonably argued the standards are too extreme or burdensome. Instead, the standards simply set a base level of animal husbandry practices, based on expert advice and scientific standards, which must be adhered to in order to assure dog health in commercial kennels.

2. The Department appreciates the support expressed by the commentator. At the recommendation of the Independent Regulatory Review Commission, the Department has added language to the final-form regulation that sets forth the general flooring parameters of the statute. In addition, the Department, following many of the standards established by the Canine Health Board in the Guidelines, has established provisions that must be met in order for optional flooring to be approved.

3. The Department appreciates the support of the commentator. Mechanical ventilation is required and must be operated at all times. The final-form regulation requires 100 cubic feet per minute per dog of air circulation. The engineers consulted were of the opinion that air exchanges per hour were not able to be properly calculated or measured, but cubic feet per minute per dog could be certified, verified and enforced. The circulation must be at the height of the dogs. The air may be re-circulated, which allows for better control of humidity, temperature, ammonia levels and pathogens. The ventilated air must be filtered.

The Department, in the final-form regulation, no longer requires a measurement of "air changes per hour", but instead requires a measurement of cubic feet per minute per dog. The final-form regulation does not require 8-20 fresh air exchanges per hour nor does it require 100% fresh air. One of the reasons the Department changed the ventilation and auxiliary ventilation standards from air exchanges per hour to cubic feet per minute per dog, was to assure a more objective and measurable standard. The change was suggested in the comments submitted by Dr. Kephart of the Pennsylvania State University and in consultations with engineers from Learned Design and Paragon Engineering Services.

In addition, in response to the comments submitted the Department did additional research and consulted animal scientists from the Pennsylvania State University, engineers and architects that design and build kennel housing facilities, Department veterinarians and had additional discussions with Canine Health Board veterinarians. As a result, the Department, in the final-form regulation, no longer requires a measurement of "air changes per hour", but instead requires a measurement of cubic feet per minute per dog. The change to CFM per dog is consistent with comments submitted by Dr. Kephart of the Pennsylvania State University and discussions and consultations with Dr. Mikesell and Dr. Kephart, as well as, discussions and consultations with engineers from Learned Design and Paragon Engineering Services.

Therefore, the Department, in the final-form regulation, no longer requires a measurement of "air changes per hour", but instead requires a measurement of cubic feet per minute per dog. Generally, the provisions of paragraph (8) of section 28a.2 the proposed regulations has been either deleted or extensively modified in the final-form regulation. Air changes have been replaced by cubic feet per minute (CFM) per dog and standards and measuring tools for the CFM per dog standard are quite specific and have been set forth in subsection (f)(1) through (6) of section 28a.2 of the final form regulation. Specific standards related to circulation of the air, minimum fresh air rates and filtration are established in subsection 28a.2(f)(3)-(6) of the final-form regulation. The provisions of subsection 28a.2(b) of the final-form regulation now entail information the Department requires of the kennel owner, including certification from a professional engineer. The information requested is directly related to and provides verification of compliance with the ventilation and air circulation standards established by the final-form regulation.

As set forth previously, the final-form regulation requires written certification under the signature and seal of a professional engineer verifying the engineer has inspected the ventilation system and that it meets all of the requirements of the regulations, including auxiliary ventilation and humidity standards. This change was made in response to comments that the ventilation standards were too subjective, too burdensome to continually assure compliance, could result in different readings depending on the equipment utilized or the place in the kennel the readings were taken and were too expensive to monitor. The certification is a one time cost, that according to the engineers consulted, is part of the price quoted for a project. The engineers would already certify a system to comply with applicable regulations and code requirements. Therefore, the change allows for an objective standard, does not increase the cost of the regulation and in fact decreases equipment, monitoring and training costs and allows for a professional third party, trained in to make such evaluations to assure the system installed or retrofitted to the kennel meets the requirements of the regulations.

Because of the restructuring of the section all of the provisions of section 28a.2(8)(iii) have been deleted from the final-form regulation. In addition, fresh air is now defined and the provisions of section 28a.2(i) requiring 100% fresh air has been deleted from the final-form regulation. While not prohibited by the regulation itself, it is no longer required. Instead, commercial kennel housing facilities are required to provide a "minimum" amount of "fresh air" circulation at thirty percent (30%), with seventy percent (70%) of the air being re-circulated through filters. This rate allows for pathogens to be removed and filtered, reduces heating costs in the winter and cooling and humidity control costs in the summer and allows for better control of the dog kennel environment. The standard was set based on the expert advice of the engineers, animal scientists and veterinarians consulted. This was done after consultations with the engineers and architects that design kennel buildings revealed that a 100% fresh air exchange rate in Pennsylvania would make it too expensive to heat or cool the kennel housing facility, would not allow for recapture of heated or cooled air and would not allow for proper humidity control in the kennel housing facility. The provisions of the final-form regulation no longer require a measurement of "air exchanges", but are instead based on the cubic feet of the kennel, the number of dogs housed in the kennel and the CFM ratings on the ventilation equipment creating air circulation in the kennel building. The change to CFM per dog was based on the comments and then consultations with engineers from Learned Design and Paragon Engineering Services, as well as, Animal Scientists, Dr. Kephart and Dr. Mikesell of the Pennsylvania State University.

The culmination of the conversations and consultations was to measure ventilation rates in cubic feet per minute (CFM) per dog, as opposed to air changes per hour. There are two general reasons behind this change. CFM per dog is much more easily measured and verified and is more objective in nature. As set forth in the final-form regulations, compliance will be based on CFM information on the ventilation equipment, certification by a professional engineer and information supplied by the kennel owner and verified by a professional engineer, such as the cubic feet of each area of the kennel housing facility in which dogs are housed and the number of dogs housed or able to be housed in each area of the kennel housing facility. Second, CFM per dog will allow kennel owners to design their ventilation systems to have only that total capacity required to circulate the minimum amount of air for the total number of dogs able to be housed in the kennel housing facility. It will then allow the kennel operator to utilize only that capacity necessary to achieve the required circulation for the number of dogs present. In other words, the system will be easier to design, will only have to be designed to account for the maximum number of dogs the kennel owner will have in the kennel housing facility and will allow the kennel owner to utilize less of the total capacity of the system if dog numbers decrease. It is a more objective standard, easier to measure and verify and fairer and less costly to operate, as the total CFM rate will increase and decrease based on the number of dogs. Neither the Department nor the kennel owner will have to be an engineer to figure out the required ventilation rates in the kennel housing facility.

Comment:

In the spirit of Act 119 and the power it grants to the Canine Health Board, I wish to voice my support of the CHB's recommended regulations pertaining to lighting, temperature control, ventilation, control of humidity and ammonia levels and exercise. The regulation of each of these environmental factors will significantly impact the health and welfare of the breeder dogs kept in Pennsylvania's large scale commercial breeding facilities in a positive way and serves to finalize the Act and the work of the General Assembly. Please do not further delay the relief the dogs have waited so long to receive, and expedite the passage of these regulations as soon as possible.

RESPONSE

The Department appreciates the support expressed by this commentator and has worked diligently to draft a final-form regulation in a timely manner. The final-form regulation drafted by the Department, as required by the Dog Law, sets very specific ventilation, auxiliary ventilation, humidity, ammonia, lighting and flooring standards for dogs housed in commercial kennels.

The Department has made substantive changes to the final-form regulation, including deleting and restructuring language that was in the proposed regulation, which the Department believes may have either been outside the statutory authority granted by the statute or was unclear or too subjective in nature. A majority of the overall changes made to the final-form regulations were based upon the comments and the input received during the rulemaking process. As stated previously, the Department has taken the comments and concerns expressed in all of the submitted comments very seriously. This should be evident in the responses to the comments and in the language of the final-form regulation. As stated in answers to similar comments from other commentators, the Department scrutinized all of the comments, consulted with engineers, architects, Departmental and Canine Health Board veterinarians, experts in auxiliary ventilation utilized in kennels, members of a commercial kennel group and did its own additional research in order to assure the final-form regulation meets the mandates of the Act. The final-form regulation is intended to and does set standards that are within the scope of authority granted by the Act and that meet the Department's statutory duty to protect the health and welfare of the dogs housed in commercial kennels. The final-form regulation is drafted in a manner – breaking the regulation into sections that set standards for the specific provisions required to be addressed by the regulation - intended to provide additional clarity and contains language and standards that are objective and measurable.

The Department, under the constraints of the statute, has endeavored to draft a final-form regulation that comports with the statutory mandates and still establishes ventilation, auxiliary ventilation, humidity, ammonia level, lighting and flooring standards that protect the health and welfare of dogs housed in commercial kennels. In doing so, the Department contacted and consulted with many of the engineers, architects, animal scientists that commented on the proposed regulation. The Department also consulted veterinarians from the Canine Health Board and Department veterinarians with regard to the final standards established in the final-form regulation. The standards in the final-form regulation are within the statutory mandate of the Act, are objective and measurable and will be enforceable.

The final-form regulations establish a basic level of care that is within the authority of the parameters of sections 207(h)(6)(7)(8) and 221(f) of the Dog Law and which are based on input and consultations with experts such as engineers and architects who design and build kennel facilities, animal scientists and veterinarians from the Canine Health Board and the Department.

The final-form regulation is drafted to comply with not only the authority, but the duty imposed by the statute and the Pennsylvania General Assembly. The final-form regulation is within the statutory authority imposed by the Act and carries out the duty to assure that ventilation, auxiliary ventilation, humidity, ammonia, lighting and alternative flooring standards in commercial kennels are based on animal husbandry practices and account for the health and welfare of dogs housed in commercial kennels.

Comments:

1. I strongly endorse and support the regulations created and proposed by the Canine Health Board and the Department. I hope they will be approved and implemented as soon as possible in order to protect dogs.
2. People shouldn't be allowed to profit from the suffering of helpless animals . I am a firm believer that we should treat every living being the way we would want to be treated. Please base your decision on morals, not profits.
3. Pennsylvania's reputation has been tarnished by being branded a "puppy mill" capital which allows dogs to be raised in inhumane conditions.
4. Pennsylvania Commercial Kennel bred and raised dogs and puppies often are sold to neighboring states where medical professionals and trainers see the results of poor kennel conditions on the mental and physical well being of the animals.
5. These regulations are based in scientific research and on advice provided by scientific experts.
6. These regulations will ensure that any dog who is commercially bred will be given adequate light, heat, ventilation, air quality, flooring, and social exposure and interaction - all essential factors that were OMITTED from the recently enacted dog law. For the first time, commercially bred puppies and dogs will have a guarantee of an environment that will promote - not hinder - behavioral and physical health.
7. It is time that Pennsylvania was a leader in humane care of animals, rather than always appearing in the news for the numerous abuses that occur here. This regulation will ensure humane care.
8. As a taxpayer in the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania I am sickened when I see that we are known as the "puppy mill state." We can and should do better!!
9. As a concerned American, I cannot sit silently while lobbyists for those who have selfish financial interests lobby to oppose the reasonable regulations. It is too bad that responsible breeders, who respect the lives that they bring into the world are tainted by those who are too greedy to understand that they could provide quality care and still make a profit for themselves. Think of your actions in approving the regulation as tantamount to passing a child labor law. These are intelligent creatures who, when grown are equivalent to a child of 2 to 3 years old.

RESPONSES

1.-9. The Department appreciates the support expressed by this commentator and has worked diligently to draft a final-form regulation in a timely manner. The final-form regulation drafted by the Department, as required by the Dog Law, sets very specific ventilation, auxiliary ventilation, humidity, ammonia, lighting and flooring standards for dogs housed in commercial kennels.

The Department has made substantive changes to the final-form regulation, including deleting and restructuring language that was in the proposed regulation, which the Department believes may have either been outside the statutory authority granted by the statute or was unclear or too subjective in nature. A majority of the overall changes made to the final-form regulations were based upon the comments and the input received during the rulemaking process. As stated previously, the Department has taken the comments and concerns expressed in all of the submitted comments very seriously. This should be evident in the responses to the comments and in the language of the final-form regulation. As stated in answers to similar comments from other commentators, the Department scrutinized all of the comments, consulted with engineers, architects, Departmental and Canine Health Board veterinarians, experts in auxiliary ventilation utilized in kennels, members of a commercial kennel group and did its own additional research in order to assure the final-form regulation meets the mandates of the Act. The final-form regulation is intended to and does set standards that are within the scope of authority granted by the Act and that meet the Department's statutory duty to protect the health and welfare of the dogs housed in commercial kennels. The final-form regulation is drafted in a manner – breaking the regulation into sections that set standards for the specific provisions required to be addressed by the regulation - intended to provide additional clarity and contains language and standards that are objective and measurable.

The Department, under the constraints of the statute, has endeavored to draft a final-form regulation that comports with the statutory mandates and still establishes ventilation, auxiliary ventilation, humidity, ammonia level, lighting and flooring standards that protect the health and welfare of dogs housed in commercial kennels. In doing so, the Department contacted and consulted with many of the engineers, architects, animal scientists that commented on the proposed regulation. The Department also consulted veterinarians from the Canine Health Board and Department veterinarians with regard to the final standards established in the final-form regulation. The standards in the final-form regulation are within the statutory mandate of the Act, are objective and measurable and will be enforceable.

The final-form regulations establish a basic level of care that is within the authority of the parameters of sections 207(h)(6)(7)(8) and 221(f) of the Dog Law and which are based on input and consultations with experts such as engineers and architects who design and build kennel facilities, animal scientists and veterinarians from the Canine Health Board and the Department.

The final-form regulation is drafted to comply with not only the authority, but the duty imposed by the statute and the Pennsylvania General Assembly. The final-form regulation is within the statutory authority imposed by the Act and carries out the duty to assure that ventilation, auxiliary ventilation, humidity, ammonia, lighting and alternative flooring standards in commercial kennels are based on animal husbandry practices and account for the health and welfare of dogs housed in commercial kennels.

gaseous filtration (such as with activated-charcoal filters) can be used but only in limited applications, provided that

- Room air is mixed with at least 50% fresh air (that is, the supply air does not exceed 50% recycled air).
- Husbandry practices, such as bedding-change and cage-washing frequency, and the preparation of recycled air used are sufficient to minimize toxic gases and odors.
  - Recycled air is returned only to the room or area from which it was generated, except if it comes from other than animal-housing areas.
- Recycled air is appropriately conditioned and mixed with sufficient fresh air to address the thermal and humidity requirements of animals in that space.

Frequent bedding changes and cage-cleaning coupled with husbandry practices, such as low animal density within the rooms and lower environmental temperature and humidity, can also reduce the concentration of toxic or odor-causing gases in animal-room air. Treatment of recycled air for either particulate or gaseous contaminants is expensive and can be rendered ineffective by improper or insufficient maintenance of filtration systems. These systems should be properly maintained and monitored appropriately to maximize their effectiveness.

The successful operation of any HVAC system requires regular maintenance and evaluation, including measurement of its function at the level of the secondary enclosure. Such measurements should include supply- and exhaust-air volumes, as well as static-pressure differentials, where applicable.

Illumination

Light can affect the physiology, morphology, and behavior of various animals (Brainard and others 1986; Erkert and Grober 1986; Newbold and others 1991; Tucker and others 1984). Potential photostressors include inappropriate photoperiod, photointensity, and spectral quality of the light (Stoskopf 1983). Numerous factors can affect animals' needs for light and should be considered when an appropriate illumination level is being established for an animal holding room. These include light intensity, duration of exposure, wavelength of light, light history of the animal, pigmentation of the animal, time of light exposure during the circadian cycle, body temperature, hormonal status, age, species, sex, and stock or strain of animal (Brainard 1989; Duncan and O'Steen 1985; O'Steen 1980; Saltarelli and Coppola 1979; Semple-Rowland and Dawson 1987; Wax 1977).

In general, lighting should be diffused throughout an animal holding area and provide sufficient illumination for the well-being of the animals and to allow good housekeeping practices, adequate inspection of animals—including the bottom-most cages in racks—and safe working conditions for personnel. Light in animal holding rooms should provide for adequate vision and for neuroendocrine regulation of diurnal and circadian cycles (Brainard 1989).

Photoperiod is a critical regulator of reproductive behavior in many species of animals (Brainard and others 1986; Cherry 1987) and can also alter body-weight gain and feed intake (Tucker and others 1984). Inadvertent light exposure during the dark cycle should be minimized or avoided. Because some species will not eat in low light or darkness, such illumination schedules should be limited to a duration that will not compromise the well-being of the animals. A time-controlled lighting system should be used to ensure a regular diurnal cycle, and timer performance should be checked periodically to ensure proper cycling.

The most commonly used laboratory animals are nocturnal. Because the albino rat is more susceptible to phototoxic retinopathy than other species, it has been used as a basis for establishing room illumination levels (Lanum 1979). Data for room light intensities for other animals, based on scientific studies, are not available. Light levels of about 325 lux (30 ft-candles) about 1.0 m (3.3 ft) above the floor appear to be sufficient for animal care and do not cause clinical signs of phototoxic retinopathy in albino rats (Bellhorn 1980), and levels up to 400 lux (37 ft-candles) as measured in an empty room 1 m from the floor have been found to be satisfactory for rodents if management practices are used to prevent retinal damage in albino rats (Clough 1982). However, the light experience of an individual animal can affect its sensitivity to phototoxicity; light of 130-270 lux above the light intensity under which it was raised has been reported to be near the threshold of retinal damage in some individual albino rats according to histologic, morphometric, and electrophysiologic evidence (Semple-Rowland and Dawson 1987). Some guidelines recommend a light intensity as low as 40 lux at the position of the animal in midcage (NASA 1988). Young albino and pigmented mice prefer much lower illumination than adults (Wax 1977), although potential retinal damage associated with housing these rodents at higher light levels is mostly reversible. Thus, for animals that have been shown to be susceptible to phototoxic retinopathy, light at the cage level should be between 130 and 325 lux.

Management practices, such as rotating cage position relative to the light source (Greenman and others 1982) or providing animals with ways to modify their own light exposure by behavioral means (e.g., via tunneling or hiding in a structure), can be used to reduce inappropriate light stimulation of animals. Provision of variable-intensity light controls might be considered as a means of ensuring that light intensities are consistent with the needs of animals and personnel working in animal rooms and with energy conservation. Such controls should have some form of vernier scale and a lockable setting and should not be used merely to turn room lighting on and off. The Illuminating Engineering Society of North America (IESNA) handbook (Kaufman 1984, 1987) can assist in decisions concerning lighting uniformity, color-rendering index, shielding, glare control, reflection, lifetime, heat generation, and ballast selection.

Heat Stress Index Chart for Swine Producers

By Iowa State University - Due to the fact that the US National Weather Service (NWS) has cut back on information that they provide to radio stations on livestock heat stress, ISU has developed a heat stress index chart to aid swine producers in making management decisions based on the current weather situation.

The heat stress indices (HSI) combine the effects of both temperature and relative humidity, and classified as alert, danger, and emergency zones.

Because different animal species and humans have different sensitivities to temperature and relative humidity, the heat stress charts are thus unique of that particular species.

For example, compared to swine, cattle can tolerate much higher temperature at lower relative humidity. This difference arises from the fact that cattle exposed to hot temperature can dissipate their body heat more effectively by sweating, whereas swine or poultry do not have sweat glands. As temperature increases, thereby temperature difference between the environment and the animal narrows, more body heat has to be dissipated via the so-called evaporative heat loss mode.

The natural capability of sweating by cattle gives them an edge over swine and poultry to rid of their body heat in the hot and dry conditions. By the same token, increase in relative humidity during hot weather will put cattle under stress much faster than for pigs or chickens.

The following figure is the one relevant to swine.

The following lists the recommended management actions for the three HSI categories.

Alert

Prepare to take necessary cooling measures; increase ventilation rate; turn on cooling fans where applicable; monitor animal behavior for signs of heat stress such as panting or open mouth; make plenty of drinking water available.

16. Abstract Male beagle dogs were subjected to various hot air temperature/humidity combinations in an attempt to develop a safe temperature/humidity index for dogs being transported by aircraft. Only those environments in which all exposed dogs could maintain a rectal temperature less than 108 °F during 6 hours of continuous exposure were considered safe.  Results from the experiments provided data to formulate an equation used in defining the tolerance index. Increasing the environment's humidity serves as a catalyst in decreasing a dog's tolerance to heat. In order to offset the effects of an increase in air temperature (starting at 85 °F with a 90 percent relative humidity), relative humidity would need to be decreased by 4 percent for every 1 °F rise in temperature. Changes in rectal temperature and behavior (barking and excessive movement) in relation to the exposure environment are presented and discussed.  Partial funding for this study was provided by the United States Department of Agriculture under an interagency cooperative agreement.

A TEMPERATURE/HUMIDITY TOLERANCE INDEX FOR TRANSPORTING BEAGLE DOGS IN HOT WEATHER

Introduction

Pet owners, humane organizations, shippers, and others have long been justifiably concerned about the health and safety of dogs when transported by commercial aircraft during hot weather. Because animal deaths have occurred in air transportation during hot weather seasons, the United States Department of Agriculture (USDA) incorporated air temperature limits in the Animal Welfare Act, which applies to dogs shipped by commercial conveyances.

Present transportation regulations stipulate that dogs shall not be transported when the ambient air temperature surrounding a live dog exceeds 85 °F or if the animal will be subjected to an air temperature in excess of 75 °F for more than 4 hours at any time (2). While this regulation affords some assurance for safe and humane treatment during transport, it also presents the problem for the shipper and the airline that since temperatures above 85 °F are not uncommon in the summer, the consignee of a dog cannot be certain whether their animal will be accepted for shipment by the airlines because of different interpretations of the regulations.

Dogs can often withstand extremely warm air temperatures, if airflow is adequate and not restricted; water is available for drinking; and the humidity of the environment remains low. A dog's primary and most efficient mechanism for dissipating excess body heat is by evaporative heat loss through open-mouth panting. High humidity restricts evaporative heat loss and inhibits effective cooling in the dog. Present standards do not address humidity in determining warm air temperature limits.

The purpose of this study was to determine which warm air temperature/humidity combinations would be safely tolerated by short-haired dogs confined in a shipping crate of 14 percent ventilation and to use this data to develop a temperature/humidity tolerance index for dogs subjected to shipping containers (14 percent ventilation) during air travel in hot weather months.

Methods

Dogs selected for the study had to be of the same sex and uniform in age, size, weight, body conformation, breed, and evenness of temperament. Breeding background had to be verifiable, and the dogs had to be readily available. The dog type that fit these criteria was the colony-bred beagle. Dogs used in experiments were healthy males between 6 and 7 months of age and weighed from 18 to 23 pounds. They were maintained on a diet of Purina Puppy Chow® and/or Hill's PD® canned food, depending on their arrival weight. None of the animals received any medication for at least 7 days prior to testing. Their order for testing was determined by body weight, with the heavier dogs tested first. Prior to testing, all dogs were semiconditioned to a wire face muzzle (used during testing to prevent chewing of the test equipment) and a test shipping crate.

On the days of testing, the dogs were fed 4 ounces of Hill's® PD canned food. Thirty minutes later they were weighed and prepared for testing. A flexible thermistor probe was inserted about 6 inches past the anal sphincter to monitor rectal temperature (RT). Both RT and behavior (barking and excessive movement) were monitored continuously for all dogs. At 9:00 a.m. daily the dogs were transported in a test crate to a room outside the test chamber, where baseline data were obtained for 45 minutes; ambient air temperature was 74-75 °F. All dogs were tested individually only once in a crate with 14 percent openness to satisfy required ventilation (3) (Figure 1). At 10:00 a.m. the dogs (one test per day) were handcarried into the exposure chamber and placed in a preheated test crate. Nine temperature/humidity conditions were studied using 10 dogs in each condition. The test environments were provided in the Civil Aeromedical Institute (CAMI) animal environmental chamber (10'H by 10'L by 8'W). Airflow supplying the heat and humidity to the chamber was located in the ceiling and not directed at the open areas of the crate. Environmental conditions desired were obtained 12 hours in advance of testing and maintained throughout heat exposure. Excessive movement was observed through a window in the chamber. Barking could be heard through an intercom system. Chamber and crate temperature/humidity were recorded every 5 minutes.

It had been demonstrated previously that healthy dogs could tolerate a hot environment without residual effects as long as their rectal temperatures remained below 108 °F (4). If a dog's rectal temperature reached 108 °F during the testing, he was removed from the test. If a rectal temperature of 108 °F was not reached, the dogs were monitored during a maximum of 6 hours of exposure. Following testing, dogs were returned to their living quarters and observed for a minimum of 7 days for any signs of postexposure sequelae.

Results

Table 1 shows the percentage of dogs which safely tolerated 6 hours of continuous exposure to each environmental condition while confined in a crate with 14 percent of its wall surface area open for ventilation. In this study, the use of the phrase "safely tolerate" refers to the natural ability of the dogs to maintain a rectal temperature less than 108 °F at all times during exposure to a hot/humid environment and not demonstrate ill effects from the exposure. None of the exposed dogs were allowed to succumb to any of the nine hot/humid environments studied.

Figure 1. Simulated shipping crate (30"L by 22"H by 18"W) used for exposing beagle dogs to heated environments. Each of the two parallel long sides provides 16 percent ventilation. The two parallel short ends are not open for ventilation. Total openness of the crate (considering all four sides) for ventilation purposes equals 14 percent.

Table 2 shows the average time in minutes at which dogs exposed to each environment started open-mouth panting and at what rectal temperature the open-mouth panting began. Data indicate that, when the air temperature remained constant, the dogs exposed to the higher humidity start the panting process earlier than those at lower humidities. If humidity remained constant, the dogs exposed to the higher air temperatures also started panting earlier than those at lower temperatures. However, there was little difference in each group's rectal temperature when open-mouth panting started.

The ability of the dogs to safely tolerate hot environments was dependent on the air humidity (Table 3), as well as air temperature. Data suggests that, for dogs to maintain approximately the same effective rate of evaporative cooling, relative humidity needed to be lowered by 20 percent (e.g., 90 to 70 percent RH) for every 5 °F increase in air temperature above 85 °F.

Only four temperature/humidity conditions were safely tolerated by all exposed dogs for 6 hours. Data from these four conditions is presented in greater detail in Tables 4, 5, 6, and 7. Each group's average rectal temperatures increased as the environment's air temperature increased. However, all dogs were able to maintain a rectal temperature less than 108 °F throughout exposure because relative humidity was sufficiently lowered as air temperature increased (Table 4). Figure 2 shows the pattern of average rectal temperature for each test condition during 6 hours of exposure. The average rectal temperature at the end of 6 hours for dogs exposed at 85 °F/90 percent RH was lower than the starting value. habituation Dogs tested in each environment displayed discontent from the test conditions by barking and exhibiting excessive movement (movement other than the expected repositioning of the body during a 6-hour period). However, not all dogs, at each test condition, displayed barking or excessive movement. Those that did bark all started during the first hour of exposure, whereas only some of the dogs that displayed excessive movement initiated this activity during the first hour of testing. Table 5 shows that the average time spent barking increased as the air temperature of the test environment increased. However, there was no clear relationship between excessive movement and the test environment temperature (Table 6). More than 50 percent of all barking and excessive movement took place during the first hour of testing (Table 7).

Results from all nine environments studied provided the data necessary to formulate equations that would show which hot weather temperature/humidity combinations could or could not be safely tolerated by 100 percent of the dogs exposed.

Fitting of Tolerance Data

Assiduous inspection of the data indicated that a linear equation (of the form  $4T + H + \text{constant}$ ) described the line of separation between 100 percent tolerance and less than 100 percent tolerance.  $T$  = the air temperature (F) of the exposure environment;  $H$  = the relative humidity (%RH) of the environment, and the constant = 430. A parallel line also appeared in the area of zero tolerance. A difference of 60 existed in the  $4T + H$  between 100 percent tolerance and zero tolerance. If we let  $X = 4T + H - 430$ , then when  $X = 0$ , we have 100 percent tolerance, and at  $X = 60$ , we have zero tolerance. The trivial mathematical solution shows that there is 100 percent tolerance for  $X$  less than zero, and zero tolerance for  $X$  greater than 60. Assuming an "S shaped" response over the interval between  $X = 0$  and  $X = 60$ , a cubic equation, which has been used frequently to fit biological response, was used to fit the range.

A general form of the cubic equation is:

$$ax^3 + bx^2 + cx + d = 1 \quad [\text{Eq. 1}]$$

If we let  $x=0$ , then  $d=1$ . We want the cubic to be zero at  $x=60$ .

$$\text{i.e.: } a60^3 + b60^2 + c60 + 1 = 0 \quad [\text{Eq. 2}]$$

Additional properties needed are for derivatives to be equal to zero when  $x=0$  and when  $x=60$ . The derivative of equation (1) is:

$$3ax^2 + 2bx + c = 0$$

$$\text{when } x = 0, \text{ then } c = 0$$

$$\text{when } x = 60, 3a60^2 + 2b60 = 0$$

which leads to  $b = -90a$ .

Substituting into equation (2), we solve for  $a = 1/108,000$ .
Substituting into the general cubic equation we have:

$$1/108,000 x^3 - \frac{90}{108,000} * x^2 + 1 = \text{tolerance}$$

$$\text{and } \left( 1 - \frac{x^2(90-x)}{108,000} \right) * 100 = \text{percent tolerance} \quad [\text{Eq. 3}]$$

Equation [3] is used to determine a tolerance less than 100 percent (when x falls between 0 and 60). A tolerance of less than 100 percent means that it is expected that some percentage less than 100 of the dogs exposed to that particular temperature/humidity combination would not be able to safely tolerate the exposure as previously described.

By using the above equations, a tolerance index (Table 8) was developed to show the percentage of healthy adult dogs that would be expected to safely tolerate the given high temperature and humidity conditions during transport.

Discussion

* It is easily understood how an increase in atmospheric temperature can cause an increase in body temperature, especially when the air temperature rises to near body temperature and above. Humidity alone does not directly cause the body temperature to rise. However, when the air temperature is near 80 F and higher, high humidity can promote an increase in body temperature by decreasing evaporative heat loss through open-mouth panting (1). The net quantity of heat lost by evaporation is an inverse function of the environmental temperature and humidity (5).

* Besides the usual problems induced by high temperature and humidity, it must be recognized that what a dog experiences when living in a typical hot/humid environment (e.g., at home, in the shade, relaxed, with water available, and munching on morsels of food) is not the same as the stressful confinement of a shipping crate with restricted ventilation. We have observed that, under nonstress conditions, a dog's rectal temperature can rise several degrees Fahrenheit when it is first placed in a crate (even though it has had previous experience being in the crate). If the dog is allowed to relax with few outside disturbances, its rectal temperature will return to normal levels. Some of the observed dogs appeared to accept the confinement of the crate more easily than others. While recording baseline data outside the test chamber, we noted that some animals' acceptance seemed to be related to their ability to maintain visual contact with or awareness of the investigator who was seated several feet away.

When the dogs were placed in the hot/humid environment of the test chamber, many became disturbed and exhibited behavioral responses. The two categories of recorded responses were barking and excessive movement. Barking was transmitted by means of an intercom between the chamber and outside. Excessive movement (observed visually) was any movement other than normal postural changes, such as pawing at the crate wall or floor, continuous circling, slithering around the crate floor, and twisting/turning. For most dogs, this type of activity occurred more intensely within the first hour in the test environment. Initial isolation in this strange environment may have contributed slightly to early barking. Usually within an hour, the dogs would then generally calm down and appear to accept the situation with only sporadic episodes of activity. Rectal temperature would generally rise when barking or excessive movement occurred. However, when the dogs became quiet, rectal temperature would decline unless activity had been quite intense.

The calculated safety zone shows the temperature/humidity combinations healthy adult dogs could safely tolerate for 6 hours of continuous exposure when confined in a shipping crate with no less than 14 percent of its total wall surface open for ventilation. Temperature/humidity combinations beyond 100 °F/30% RH and 85 °F/90% RH were not tested on dogs. The calculated danger zone indicates the chances of a dog safely tolerating those temperature/humidity combinations when tolerance is less than 100 percent.

* | Open-mouth panting with the tongue extended was normal during heat exposure. However, two dogs at 85 °F/90%RH and one dog at 90 °F/70%RH never exhibited open-mouth panting during 6 hours of heat exposure. The peak rectal temperatures for these three dogs were 101.4, 101.6, and 102.3 °F respectively. The time when panting began appeared to be influenced by an increase in either air temperature or humidity, all other conditions remaining constant. Rectal temperatures when panting started were very similar among the groups, regardless of the environment.

General observations of the test animals seemed to indicate that the first 30 to 60 minutes of exposure to hot environments are critical for a dog in establishing the ability to successfully tolerate the heat. Early open-mouth panting with little or no excitement appears to enable the dogs to maintain a lower rectal temperature for a longer period.

Conclusions

Based on separate studies at CAMI, a hot/humid environment which causes a dog's rectal temperature to rise above 108 °F exposes that animal to possible heat stroke and even death. Such environments should not be considered safe for shipping dogs.

* | Healthy adult dogs transported in USDA-approved shipping kennels having no less than 14 percent overall ventilation capacity should be expected to safely tolerate air temperatures of 100 °F or less during 6 hours of transport, provided proper consideration is given to the humidity of the shipping environment.

Our studies also indicated that any given dog's behavior cannot be reliably predicted when that dog is confined to a shipping kennel and exposed to a stressful hot/humid environment. When a fractious dog is anticipated, assistance in helping that dog maintain a relative state of quiescence is advantageous. This can usually be accomplished by administering a low level tranquilizer.

The temperature/humidity index discussed in this report should serve as a useful guide for shippers and airlines when transporting dogs during the summer months.

Relative humidity recommendations for dogs at ambient temperatures >85 degrees F

Published data are available for 6-7 month old male beagles, 18-23 pounds. The 'tolerance range' of temperature and humidity conditions for a 6 hour exposure were measured (Hanneman and Sershon, 1987). Based on these findings the authors concluded that for every 1 degree increase in temperature (T) you needed to have a 4% decrease in relative humidity (RH) (in other words, a 20% decrease in RH for any 5 degree F increase in T > 85 degrees F) to keep dogs in the 'tolerance range' where 100% of them would survive.

These measurements were based on 4 measured treatments, 10 dogs per treatment, and an additional 5 calculated from the other measures, over a temperature range of 85 degrees F through 105 degrees F – a range representative of PA in the summer – and a RH range of 30-90%. Survivorship ranged from 0-100%. These data were then used to construct a 'tolerance zone' where 100% of dogs would survive for 6 hours. The table below shows the RH that must be available to guarantee survivorship during a 6 h exposure.

Temperature in degrees F – up to and including T noted:	RH in % must be less than or equal to:
89	75
90	70
91	66
92	62
93	58
94	54
95	50
96	46
97	42
98	38
99	34
100	30
101	26
102	22
103	18
104	14

This means that at any time and for any duration when the ambient air temperature – the air temperature to which the dog could be exposed when measured under US weather bureau standard conditions (i.e., free airflow, 2 m off ground, thermometer in shade, et cetera) - indoor or outdoor - is >85 degrees F, given that the dogs have unfettered access, they must have access to an area where the RH is maintained at or below the % listed in the table above for any given temperature. It is unlikely that this requirement could be met without providing shade and air movement, and those factors must be provided at the height of the dog (e.g., the dog must be in the moving air stream so that air of the required humidity is the air inspired during the inspiration phase of panting – the primary means by which dogs engage in evaporative cooling).

The available data are not exhaustive. They make no allowances for age, breed, sex, health, size, hair coat, facial conformation (brachycephalic/dolicocephalic), exposure durations greater than 6 h, et cetera. Accordingly, we should note the following and err on the side of protecting the dog in these regulations.

The extant data set an upper bound for short-haired, young, fit, male dogs >18 lbs, exposed to the listed temperatures for no more than 6 h. These recommendations WILL NOT be sufficiently conservative for:

- Dogs < 18 lbs
- Dogs nursing or ill
- Dogs with heavy or long coats
- Brachycephalic dogs
- Giant breeds or those with especially heavy musculature or layered fat.

In such circumstances this table is not sufficient to guarantee survival since metabolism – and therefore panting rate – is higher in smaller dogs, and metabolic acidosis will occur when non-cooling panting occurs. As noted by the authors of this study, “when the air temperature is near 80 degrees F and higher, high humidity can promote an increase in body temperature by decreasing evaporative heat loss through open mouth panting. The net quantity of heat lost by evaporation is an inverse function of the environmental temperature and humidity.” (emphasis added) (Bard, 1961; Ingram and Mount, 1975).

Accordingly, the only rational requirement is that for dogs outside the study parameters, whenever the ambient air temperature, as defined above, is >85 degrees F, these dogs are maintained at RHs that are at least 10% LESS than those specified in the table above. This figure is a conservative estimate based on providing a margin of error as estimated by relative increases in heart rate (HR) and respiratory rate (RR) in small v. large dogs. To be safe, we’d recommend that the RH be decreased by at least 20%.

The 'tolerance range' of temperature and humidity conditions for a 6 hour exposure were measured (Hanneman and Sershon, 1987). Based on these findings the authors concluded that for every 1 degree increase in temperature (T) you needed to have a 4% decrease in relative humidity (RH) (in other words, a 20% decrease in RH for any 5 degree F increase in T > 85 degrees F) to keep dogs in the 'tolerance range' where 100% of them would survive.

These measurements were based on 9 experimental treatments, 10 dogs per treatment, over a temperature range of 85 degrees F through 105 degrees F – a range representative of PA in the summer – and a RH range of 30-90%. Survivorship ranged from 0-100%. These data were then used to construct a 'tolerance zone' where 100% of dogs would survive for 6 hours. The table below shows the RH that must be available to guarantee survivorship during a 6 h exposure.

Temperature in degrees F – up to and including T noted:	RH in % must be less than or equal to:
88	79
89	75
90	70
91	66

99	34
100	30
101	26
102	22
103	18
104	14
105	10

This means that at any time and for any duration when the ambient air temperature – the air temperature to which the dog could be exposed when measured under US weather bureau standard conditions (i.e., free airflow, 2 m off ground, thermometer in shade, et cetera) - indoor or outdoor - is >85 degrees F, given that the dogs have unfettered access, they must have access to an area where the RH is maintained at or below the % listed in the table above for any given temperature. It is unlikely that this requirement could be met without providing shade and air movement, and those factors must be provided at the height of the dog (e.g., the dog must be in the moving air stream so that air of the required humidity is the air inspired during the inspiration phase of panting – the primary means by which dogs engage in evaporative cooling).

The available data are not exhaustive. They make no allowances for age, breed, sex, health, size, hair coat, facial conformation (brachycephalic/dolicocephalic), exposure durations greater than 6 h, et cetera. Accordingly, we should note the following and err on the side of protecting the dog in these regulations.

The extant data set an upper bound for short-haired, young, fit, male dogs >18 lbs, exposed to the listed temperatures for no more than 6 h. These recommendations WILL NOT be sufficiently conservative for:

- Dogs < 18 lbs
- Dogs nursing or ill
- Dogs with heavy or long coats
- Brachycephalic dogs
- Giant breeds or those with especially heavy musculature or layered fat.

In such circumstances this table is not sufficient to guarantee survival since metabolism – and therefore panting rate – is higher in smaller dogs, and metabolic acidosis will occur when non-cooling panting occurs. As noted by the authors of this study, “when the air temperature is near 80 degrees F and higher, high humidity can promote an increase in body temperature by decreasing evaporative heat loss through open mouth panting. The net quantity of heat lost by evaporation is an inverse function of the environmental temperature and humidity.” (emphasis added) (Bard, 1961; Ingram and Mount, 1975).

Accordingly, the only rational requirement is that for dogs outside the study parameters, whenever the ambient air temperature, as defined above, is >85 degrees F, these dogs are maintained at RHs that are at least 10% LESS than those specified in the table above. This figure is a conservative estimate based on providing a margin of error as estimated by relative increases in heart rate (HR) and respiratory rate (RR) in small v. large dogs. To be safe, we’d recommend that the RH be decreased by 20%.

Issues and Guidelines for Veterinarians in Recognizing, Reporting, and Assessing Animal Neglect and Abuse

Gary J. Patronek, VMD, PhD

Introduction

Within the past several years, it has been suggested that the veterinary profession should assume a greater role in addressing cruelty to animals.<sup>1,2</sup> In their 1994 position statement on animal welfare, the American Veterinary Medical Association (AVMA) included the following text:

The AVMA recognizes that veterinarians may have occasion to observe cases of cruelty to animals, animal abuse, or animal neglect as defined by state law or local ordinances. When these observations occur, the AVMA considers it the responsibility of the veterinarian to report such cases to the appropriate authorities. Such disclosures may be necessary to protect the health and welfare of animals and people.<sup>3,4</sup>

In 1996, the AVMA added a statement on the veterinarian's role in reporting cruelty to animals, animal abuse, and animal neglect to the model practice act. This action was intended to increase practitioners' awareness of the need to report cases of animal abuse, and to enhance communication and cooperation with humane and animal control organizations.<sup>5</sup> The statement is as follows:

Section 2—Definitions 8) Practice of veterinary medicine means...e) to report known or suspected cases of cruelty to animals, animal abuse, or animal neglect, as defined by state law or local ordinances, to appropriate humane or law enforcement officials where required by law.<sup>6</sup>

Justifications for reporting cruelty to animals include the veterinary oath to prevent suffering, and also because early intervention may prevent worsening of the neglect or more serious incidents of abuse directed against animals. Because neglected animals may be visible (e.g. the underweight, barking dog tied on a chain), they may also serve as sentinels for child or elder neglect, or unhealthy home environments, such as in the case of animal collectors or "hoarders."

Inclusion of the reporting requirement in the model practice act was an important and controversial step because, by implication, such a provision could then be incorporated by states revising their veterinary practice acts and using the model act as a guide. Recently, this wording has been questioned on the basis it could be construed to limit reporting animal abuse to veterinarians. If this were true, non-veterinarians reporting abuse could be considered in violation of the practice act. Therefore, it was recommended that the wording be removed from the AVMA model practice act.<sup>7</sup> It should be noted, though, that the wording seems to endorse reporting of cruelty, abuse, and neglect only when reporting is already required by state law.

The discussion about mandating reporting has generated considerable controversy. A lack of information, and misinformation, about animal cruelty have no doubt contributed to professional anxiety over this issue. There may be fears about loss of income and becoming entwined in protracted litigation, or worries about an animal being euthanatized as a result of a report. Veterinarians may not know to whom they should make a report of animal abuse or neglect, and they may fear being prosecuted or disciplined themselves if they fail to make a report. Physicians have raised legitimate questions about the merits of mandating reporting of adult domestic violence because of possible negative consequences, including escalation of the abuse, for patients who may not be willing or able to leave an abusive home environment.<sup>8</sup> In this respect, the situation with cruelty to animals may be more similar to that of domestic violence than child abuse, because it can be very difficult to remove an animal from its owner on the basis of a suspicion. Therefore, attempts to intervene could put an animal at increased risk in some circumstances where it is not possible to remove or monitor the animal.

Like physicians, veterinarians have concerns about client confidentiality, and are troubled by ethical conflicts that arise when the interests of patients (children/animals) and clients (parents/owners) diverge. However, since animals are typically treated legally as a form of property, the ethical and practical problems for veterinarians are substantively different from those faced by physicians. From a legal perspective, contrary to physicians, the confidential relationship between physicians and patients does not always explicitly apply to veterinarians and their clients. Courts in some states (Iowa and South Dakota) have explicitly refused to recognize a veterinarian-client privilege.<sup>9-11</sup> However, other states do have confidentiality requirements pertaining to the veterinarian-client relationship. These provisions may be in veterinary practice acts, in administrative rules, or in other state statutes pertaining to the health professions. (Table 1)

There are circumstances where confidentiality requirements are explicitly waived to protect public or animal health (Table 1). The AVMA Principles of Veterinary Ethics indicate that a Doctor of Veterinary Medicine has an obligation to protect the privacy of clients, but make an exception if a veterinarian is required by law to reveal the confidence, or if it becomes necessary to protect the health and welfare of the individual, the animals, and/or others whose health and welfare may be endangered.<sup>12</sup> Idaho, New Hampshire, and Wyoming have incorporated the AVMA Principles of Veterinary Ethics into their rules or practice acts by reference. (Table 1) Five states currently require a veterinarian to report suspicions of organized dog fighting (Arizona, California, Wisconsin) or other cruelty to animals (Minnesota, West Virginia). Arizona, Idaho, California, and West Virginia have provisions protecting veterinarians from liability arising from a report made in good faith. (Table 2)

Understanding and complying with laws governing reporting cruelty and confidentiality is complicated by the fact that relevant laws may exist in sections of state law other than veterinary practice acts or the accompanying rules promulgated by state boards. Therefore, it is possible that veterinarians may be unaware of their duties and obligations regarding confidentiality and reporting of cruelty, even if they are familiar with the veterinary practice act in their state. There is some evidence that veterinary teaching hospitals tend to proceed cautiously regarding issues of client confidentiality. In 1989, a survey of 22 active members of the American Veterinary Records Association was conducted.<sup>13</sup> The survey response rate was 86%, and the general consensus was that client authorization was required to release information. However, about half of those surveyed indicated they would release information about vaccination status, neuter status, and discharge instructions without written authorization.

Formal surveys of veterinarians about barriers to reporting suspected animal abuse have not been published, although one study is underway in Massachusetts.<sup>a</sup> Surveys of physicians regarding inquiring about domestic violence among their patients indicate that barriers include feeling that they do not have the time to discuss these issues, that it is not their role to raise them, that such inquiries are too intrusive, and that

West Virginia	7-10-4a	It is the duty of any licensed veterinarian and the right of any other person to report to a humane officer any animal found, reasonably known or believed to be abandoned, neglected or cruelly treated as set forth in this article, and such veterinarians or other persons may not be subject to any civil or criminal liability as a result of such reporting.
Wisconsin	951.162	Any veterinarian who has reason to believe that an animal has been in a fight in violation of s. 951.08 shall report the matter to the local humane officer or society or county or municipal pound or to a local law enforcement agency. The report shall be in writing and shall include a description and the location of the animal, any injuries suffered by the animal and the name and address of the owner or person in charge of the animal, if known. The general penalty provisions under 939.61 do not apply to this section.

reporting will not help the situation.<sup>14,15</sup> Gender biases have also been noted among physicians, particularly with respect to dealing with spousal abuse.

For veterinarians faced with making animal abuse reports, there are substantial local differences in the type of agencies or individuals responsible for receiving reports of alleged animal abuse. Depending on the community, this can include animal shelters, animal control officers, local or state police, state veterinarians, humane societies, and sheriffs. Therefore, veterinarians may be unaware of the appropriate agency responsible for investigating animal cruelty in their community. When humane societies are the agency responsible for investigation of these cases, some veterinarians may be reluctant to become involved. This could be due to general mistrust, historical adversarial relationships, or simply a lack of confidence and unfamiliarity with the personnel who would conduct an investigation. However, these reservations could be addressed through improved communication and mutual effort to develop effective working relationships.

Medical training has been described as lax in equipping physicians to deal with painful social and personal issues such as family violence,<sup>14, 16-18</sup> and this may be one reason physicians are reluctant to become involved. Although there are well established clinical guidelines for recognizing child abuse, surveys have indicated that the problem of domestic violence is not dealt with satisfactorily in family practice residencies. It is likely that instruction regarding animal abuse and neglect is equally limited in veterinary curricula. In teaching hospitals, where the vast majority of students' clinical experience is obtained, almost all of the animals treated are valued family pets. Thus, veterinary students are unlikely to encounter many cases of neglect and abuse during their training, and they are even less likely to be exposed to the procedures for reporting a case.

A Typology of Animal Abuse

An important step in making veterinarians more confident in dealing with animal cruelty and abuse is education about the nature and scope of the problem, the specifics of relevant laws, and procedures for making a report. The epidemiology of animal abuse in the U.S. has not yet been described. The only published study of animal abuse described 1,863 cases reported to 4 SPCA's in South Africa over a 1-year period.<sup>19</sup> About 38% of the reports were found to be justified, and the vast majority of these involved general neglect, such as a dog being tied out without shelter, unsanitary conditions, and lack of necessary veterinary care. This is believed to be similar to what is reported anecdotally within the U.S., although supporting data are currently lacking. However, a study to be published from Massachusetts should add needed information.<sup>b</sup>

Researchers in South Africa have proposed a typology of animal abuse, based on the major categories of child abuse (active and passive physical and mental abuse).<sup>19</sup> (Table 3) However, these categories do not always coincide with explicit legal definitions of animal cruelty, abuse and neglect in the U.S. For example, commercial "exploitation" of a dog through breeding, sport, or competition is not specifically prohibited. There are methods of dog training that many would consider abusive, including shock collars, prong collars, hanging a dog above the ground, harsh physical punishment by the handler, beating the dog and severe correction with a choke chain. Unfortunately, no standard currently exists to define humane vs inhumane training methods. Hopefully, the growing popularity of reward-based, non-aversive training methods among dog training professionals, such as the Association of Pet Dog Trainers (APDT), may facilitate promulgation of humane training criteria.

The category of mental abuse is not specifically identified in any U.S. animal cruelty statute, although many state statutes have provisions that prohibit tormenting an animal. Most state cruelty statutes do not specifically address confinement or exercise for animals. However, Maryland specifically includes a duty to provide proper air and space, Michigan specifically prohibits overcrowding, and Minnesota, Kansas, and Ohio impose a duty for providing exercise. Many veterinarians and non-veterinarians would agree that dogs isolated for long periods by being tied in a yard and deprived of attention and companionship do suffer. One state (Vermont) prohibits tying or tethering a dog in an inhumane manner or in a manner detrimental to its welfare, but does not specify what constitutes inhumane restraint. However, another section of the Vermont law does state that a tether must be at least twice the length of the dog. There have been municipal ordinances passed prohibiting (e.g. Tuscon, AZ; Maumelle, AR; New Hanover, NC; Lawton, OK) or regulating (e.g. Jefferson County, KY) tieouts or chaining of dogs. The Jefferson County ordinance specifies that a dog may be tethered no more than 8 hours in any 24 hour period. There are also specifications about the maximum weight and minimum length of the tether, which must be attached to a pulley or trolley mounted above the ground. Also, the USDA has stated that their experience enforcing the animal welfare act has led them to conclude that continuous confinement of a dog by a tether is inhumane, and should not be an option as a means of primary enclosure.<sup>20</sup> Although isolation or tethering of a dog may be insufficient to legally constitute abuse in most jurisdictions, this could change in the future. Veterinarians are in a position to make a strong case about the effect of isolation on the well-being of a social animal like the dog denied interaction with dogs or humans. It is important to keep in mind that these situations can frequently be addressed through other avenues, because isolation and tethering are sentinels for other forms of neglect that may be more readily actionable, such as inadequate shelter or poor nutrition.

Encountering Animal Neglect and Abuse in Veterinary Practice

Anecdotal reports suggest that veterinarians are particularly wary about legal or ethical mandates to report suspicions that a client is responsible for the injuries of a patient presented for treatment. For child care professionals, Kempe's landmark report paved the way for identification and widespread recognition of pathognomonic signs for child abuse.<sup>21</sup> He suggested that particular patterns of injury, such as multiple fractures at different stages of healing, and unexplained subdural hematomas and retinal hemorrhages, indicated deliberate abuse in children. Compared with physicians, veterinarians are at a disadvantage, because there are no similar guidelines to indicate when an injury in an animal is the result of a deliberate act by the owner or caretaker.<sup>22</sup> Although there are anecdotal reports of deliberate animal abuse by veterinary clients in the UK<sup>23</sup> and the U.S.,<sup>2,24</sup> epidemiology, clinical signs and pathology of the "battered [owned] pet" are, for the most part, unknown. Accumulating this data will be difficult, because most animals that are victims of deliberate abuse will never be brought to a veterinarian for treatment by the abuser. Hopefully, a call for voluntary reporting of cases in the UK will provide additional data to help the veterinary community discriminate between accidental and deliberate injury in client's pets.<sup>23</sup>

However, anecdotal reports and clinical experience indicate certain circumstances in which a veterinarian may encounter neglect, abuse, and cruelty (Table 4). It is important to recognize that differences exist between human and veterinary medical practice in the frequency that different types of abuse are likely to be encountered by clinicians. For example, animal abusers can more easily avoid seeking medical care for their pet than can the caretakers of abused children. Thus, cases of intentional infliction of injury on a pet by a client are probably rare in most veterinary practices,<sup>22</sup> as is abuse of a sexual nature. Although deliberate abuse may be rare among veterinary clients, it is probably not uncommon in the community. When veterinarians are called on by police or humane agents to evaluate animals that have been shot, tortured, burned, or stabbed, the history and injuries sustained are likely to be prima facie evidence of deliberate abuse.

Neglect, Abuse, and the Language of the Law

The types of animals protected under laws in different states varies widely. Many states simply specify “animal,” while others go to great lengths to define an animal. For example, the Delaware statute defines animals as “excluding fish, crustaceans, and mollusks.” The Kentucky statute refers to “four legged animals.” The Indiana statute specifies “vertebrates.” The South Dakota statute specifies “mammals, birds, reptiles, amphibians, and fish.” The New Jersey, Texas, and North Carolina statutes refer to “living creatures.” These distinctions may seem trivial, but there have been instances where the ability to pursue a case has hinged on whether or not the animal alleged to have been mistreated was included under the legal definition of an “animal.”

Ownership per se is not always required in order for the duty of care provisions in state cruelty statutes to apply. Many states explicitly state that anyone who cares for, possesses, controls, or otherwise has or assumes custody of an animal is considered legally responsible for its care. Therefore, in some jurisdictions, someone feeding stray animals, or caring for the animals of a friend, has the same duty of care as if they were the owner.

It has been suggested that definitions of abuse should encompass the underlying human motivation, and that the term “cruelty” should be reserved for a small subset of cases in which the animal is harmed and the perpetrator gains satisfaction from causing the harm.<sup>25</sup> This motivational definition is particularly relevant when discussing penalties for various forms of abuse. However, it is important to recognize that most state statutes use the word “cruelty” generically to encompass both deliberate infliction of harm and harm that arises from neglect. Therefore, the operational definitions that focus more on the consequences of the human acts or omissions for the animal may be more useful when attempting to define neglect.

Not only does the vast majority of animal cruelty arise from neglect, but it is also the form of abuse most likely to be encountered by a veterinarian. Unfortunately, the vagueness in wording and the subjective nature of the interpretation of many laws contribute to the discomfort veterinarians have with these issues.<sup>26</sup> Statutes in every state have established certain duties and responsibilities for owners towards animals in their care, and also prohibit certain acts. However, the laws in different states are not consistent in their language or scope. For example, some statutes (e.g. Alabama, Table 5) make broad statements prohibiting cruelty and mistreatment, while others (e.g. Delaware, Table 6) are much more specific in defining terms such as “cruel,” “neglect,” “abandonment,” and “proper shelter.” Even when laws are fairly specific, words or phrases may still be sufficiently vague that they require substantial interpretation. For example, in the Delaware code, the provisions requiring proper shelter and proper feed, do not specify how to determine whether “unnecessary physical pain or suffering exist.”

A determination of whether or not the owner's duty of care has been breached will be heavily influenced by a subjective assessment of the animal's physical state and living conditions. Clearly a veterinary opinion could carry considerable weight in such a determination. When evaluating any animal for the possibility of neglect, it is useful to consider three general areas: the severity of problems present, the total number of problems, and the duration of the problems. (Figure 1)

General Considerations Regarding Reporting Neglect and Abuse

With these issues in mind, several points merit emphasis:

- Veterinarians are well trained in proper animal husbandry, therefore it should be possible for private practitioners to become more comfortable identifying sub-standard care and animals at risk of neglect.
- It is important, for the profession, that veterinarians, either individually or as organizations, be at the forefront of setting high standards for animal care. This will elevate the status of animals in the community and benefit veterinary practitioners as well.
- Recognizing sub-standard care does not necessarily imply an adversarial situation or becoming involved in protracted legal proceedings. In many cases of neglect, it is possible and much more productive to educate and work with the owner to improve the standard of animal care. This can be done with the support and assistance of the proper enforcement agency.
- Framing these discussions on whether the needs of the animal are being met (operational definition), rather than on the [bad] behavior of the owner (motivational definition), has the advantage of depersonalizing these issues. This lets the veterinarian assume the more comfortable role of being an educator and advocate for the animal, and offering their expertise about proper animal care, rather than as passing judgment on a person. It is also more conducive to maintaining veterinarian-client relationships.
- Diagnostic criteria for identifying the “battered pet” presented by a client are not yet well established. Concerns over ambiguities in identifying these serious, but less common situations, should not preclude veterinarians from speaking out about the much more prevalent animal abuse that arises from neglect in the community, whether due to ignorance or indifference.

- In some states, reporting suspicions of animal abuse could involve breaching client confidentiality and existing ethical codes of conduct. Veterinarians need to be aware of current laws in their own states, and to stay up to date on changes. If state law or professional codes of conduct create a conflict between the welfare of the patient and a veterinarian's ethical obligations to a client, the dilemma may need to be remedied through legislation.

The TACC Score: a Screening Tool for Identifying Animals At-risk

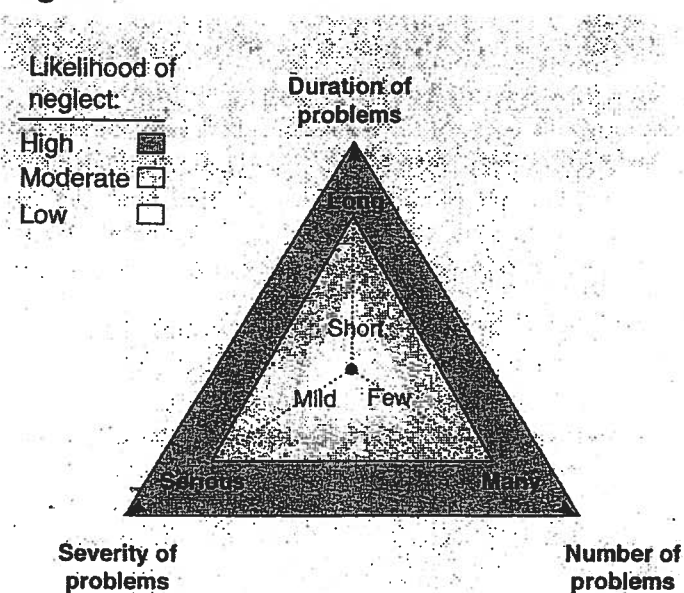

Since the failure to meet the needs of an animal is often not an all-or-none phenomenon, but a problem that occurs in degrees over a spectrum or range of neglect, veterinarians may be uncertain where to draw the line between neglect and a temporary lapse in care by a typically responsible owner. With this in mind, a simple system, the Tufts Animal Condition and Care (TACC) score, has been developed to alleviate some of the ambiguity veterinarians and law enforcement personnel face when assessing whether there is reason to believe an animal may be suffering from either chronic or acute neglect. It is based on an operational, rather than a motivational, definition of neglect. The South Carolina cruelty statute is illustrative of the logic of this approach. It defines neglect as:

Failure to provide proper food, water, protection from the elements, adequate sanitation, adequate facilities or care generally considered to be standard and accepted for an animal's health and well being, consistent with the species, breed, physical condition, and type of animal.

The TACC score incorporates scales to evaluate body condition, to assess risk from exposure to temperature extremes, and to evaluate sanitation and grooming as indicators of the adequacy of animal care. These criteria are useful because they are independent of human intent and of social norms concerning animal care, and are rooted in the consequences for the animal. This is consistent with most state cruelty statutes, which recognize that suffering can arise from acts of omission as well as commission. There is precedent for such a system in the child welfare literature. For example, a Child Care Rating Scale has been used by social workers during home visits to identify infants at risk of neglect.<sup>27</sup>

Body Condition Scale

The responsibility of an owner or caretaker to ensure that an animal receives proper nutrition (which is best indicated by an appropriate body weight) is specified either implicitly or explicitly in state anti-cruelty statutes that impose a duty to provide necessary food, or prohibiting starving an animal, depriving it of necessary sustenance, or failing to feed an animal properly. The purpose of the body condition scale is to establish whether there is a reasonable suspicion that an animal's nutritional needs are not being met, and to determine the urgency for intervention. The use of body condition scores to evaluate the physical condition of livestock is well accepted,<sup>28</sup> and a similar system exists for evaluating horse abuse.<sup>29</sup> A 9 point scale has been developed to assess body condition in dogs.<sup>30,31</sup> This scale has been shown to be reproducible and to be highly correlated with radiographic measurements of body fat, with each point representing a 5% increase in body fat. Five points of this scale, representing ideal to emaciated body conditions, combined with elements of another scale<sup>32</sup> have been adapted here as a screening tool for neglect.

There are many types of neglect that can lead to a dangerously underweight dog:

- Failure of the owner or caretaker to recognize that the dog was too thin
- Owner recognizes dog is too thin but believes he/she does not have the resources to seek or obtain help, or fears that seeking assistance may result in impoundment or euthanasia of the animal(s)
- Owner recognizes dog is thin and fails to act due to indifference
- Failure to control intestinal parasites or provide needed veterinary care to ensure adequate nutrition

However, there are also legitimate reasons that a dog

Subchapter VII. Offenses against public health, order and decency

Subpart A. Riot, disorderly conduct and related offenses

s 1325 Cruelty to animals; class A misdemeanor; class F felony.

For the purpose of this section, the following words and phrases shall include, but not be limited to, the meanings respectively ascribed to them as follows:

- (1) "Cruel" includes every act or omission to act whereby unnecessary or unjustifiable physical pain or suffering is caused or permitted.
- (2) "Cruel mistreatment" includes any treatment whereby unnecessary or unjustifiable physical pain or suffering is caused or permitted.
- (3) "Cruel neglect" includes neglect of an animal, which is under the care and control of the neglecter, whereby pain or suffering is caused to the animal or abandonment of any domesticated animal by its owner or custodian.
- (4) "Cruelty to animals" includes mistreatment of any animal or neglect of any animal under the care and control of the neglecter, whereby unnecessary or unjustifiable physical pain or suffering is caused. By way of example this includes: Unjustifiable beating of an animal; overworking an animal; tormenting an animal; abandonment of an animal; failure to feed properly or give proper shelter or veterinary care to an animal.
- (6) "Abandonment" includes completely forsaking or deserting an animal originally under one's custody without making reasonable arrangements for custody of that animal to be assumed by another person.
- (7) "Custody" includes the responsibility for the welfare of an animal subject to one's care and control whether one owns it or not.
- (8) "Proper feed" includes providing each animal with daily food and water of sufficient quality and quantity to prevent unnecessary or unjustifiable physical pain or suffering by the animal.
- (9) "Proper shelter" includes providing each animal with adequate shelter from the weather elements as required to prevent unnecessary or unjustifiable physical pain or suffering by the animal.
- (10) "Proper veterinary care" includes providing each animal with veterinary care sufficient to prevent unnecessary or unjustifiable physical pain or suffering by the animal.
- (11) "Animal" shall not include fish, crustacea or molluska.
- (12) "Serious injury" shall include any injury to any animal which creates a substantial risk of death, or which causes prolonged impairment of health or prolonged loss or impairment of the function of any bodily organ.

may appear too thin. These include old age, terminal disease, a refractory medical condition under treatment, e.g. malabsorption or maldigestion, a high degree of physical fitness due to training, or normal phenotype for a particular breed. Ultimately, a veterinary examination is required to determine whether poor body condition can be explained by reasons other than a lapse in care. If there is no legitimate reason for the dogs condition, then the TACC score provides a means of quantifying the extent of the neglect.

The body condition scale has been adapted from published canine body condition descriptions.<sup>30-32</sup> (Appendix, Scale 1) It is scored from 1-5, with "1" being a dog that is essentially unremarkable with respect to problems, and "5" a dog that is emaciated. The scoring of a dog should be based, if possible, on both palpation and visual evaluation. For long-haired dogs, a visual examination alone would be inadequate to assess body condition. When using this scale, it is important to take into account different normal canine phenotypes, since some breeds are naturally lean (e.g. sight hounds) and others are naturally heavier (e.g. St Bernard).

For purposes of the TACC score, obesity is not specifically addressed as a condition indicative of abuse. Although rational medical arguments could be made to include obesity, such an inclusion would be counter-productive because the underlying motivation of the owners of overfed dogs, and the wording and intent of existing law, would probably preclude a finding of abuse.

I. Body condition scale (Palpation essential for long-haired dogs; each dog's condition should be interpreted in light of the typical appearance of the breed)

- All bony prominences evident from a distance
- No discernible body fat
- Obvious loss of muscle mass
- Severe abdominal tuck and extreme hourglass shape

- Ribs, lumbar vertebrae, and pelvic bones easily visible
- No palpable body fat
- Some loss of muscle mass
- Prominent abdominal tuck and hourglass shape to torso

- Tops of lumbar vertebrae visible, pelvic bones becoming prominent.
- Ribs easily palpated and may be visible with no palpable fat
- Obvious waist and abdominal tuck
- Minimal loss of muscle mass

- Ribs easily palpable with minimal SQ fat
- Abdominal tuck evident
- Waist clearly visible from above
- No muscle loss
- May be normal for lean breeds such as sighthounds

- Ribs palpable without excess SQ fat
- Abdomen tucked slightly when viewed from the side
- Waist visible from above, just behind ribs

II. Weather safety scale

Read score off diagonal bars, by dog size:

To determine score, draw a line up from the current temperature and parallel to the dotted lines, and read score on bars. Common sense must be used to take into account the duration of exposure to any given temperature when assessing risk; even brief periods of high heat can be very dangerous, whereas a similar duration of exposure to cold temperatures would not be life-threatening.

In warm or weather:

- Subtract 1 pt. if water is available
- Subtract 1 pt. if dog is in a shaded area protected from full sun
- Add 1 pt. if dog is brachycephalic
- Add 1 pt. if dog is obese

In cool or cold weather:

- Add 1 pt. if toy dog
- Add 2 pts. if dog out in rain / sleet
- Subtract 1 pt. if dog is a northern or heavy-coated breed
- Subtract 1 pt. if dog has good shelter and bedding available
- Subtract 1 pt. if dog has been acclimated to cold temperatures

In all weather conditions:

- Add 1 pt. if dog is < 6 months of age or elderly

III. Environmental health scale

- 5 Filthy - many days to weeks of accumulation of feces and / or urine. Overwhelming odor, air may be difficult to breathe. Large amount of trash, garbage, or debris present; inhibits comfortable rest, normal postures, or movement and / or poses a danger to the animal. Very difficult or impossible for animal to escape contact with feces, urine, mud, or standing water. Food and / or drinking water contaminated.
- 4 Very unsanitary - many days of accumulation of feces and / or urine. Difficult for animal to avoid contact with waste matter. Moderate amount of trash, garbage, or clutter present that may inhibit comfortable rest and / or movement of the animal. Potential injury from sharp edges or glass. Significant odor, breathing unpleasant. Pools of water, mud difficult to avoid.
- 3 Unsanitary - several days accumulation of feces and urine in animal's environment. Animal is able to avoid contact with waste matter. Moderate odor present. Trash, garbage, and other debris cluttering animal's environment but does not prohibit comfortable rest or normal posture. Clutter may interfere with normal movement or allow dog to become entangled, but no sharp edges or broken glass that could injure dog. Dog able to avoid mud or water if present.
- 2 Marginal - As in #1, except may be somewhat less sanitary. No more than 1-2 day's accumulation of feces and urine in animal's environment. Slight clutter may be present.
- 1 Acceptable - Environment is dry and free of accumulated feces. No contamination of food or water. No debris or garbage present to clutter environment and inhibit comfortable rest, normal posture and range of movement or pose a danger to or entangle the animal.

"Environment" refers to the kennel, pen, yard, cage, barn, room, tie-out or other enclosure or area where the animal is confined or spends the majority of its time. All of the listed conditions do not need to be present in order to include a dog in a specific category. The user should determine which category best describes a particular dog's condition.

Interpretation of the TACC score from scales I - IV:

The Tufts Animal Condition and Care (TACC) score is assessed from the number of points read off either the Body Condition, Weather Safety, Environmental Health, or Physical Care Scale. When multiple scales are evaluated, the highest score on any scale should be used to determine the risk of neglect. Multiple high scores are indicative of greater neglect, risk, or inhumane treatment than a single high score.

Score	Body condition, physical care, environ. health scales	Weather safety scale
≥ 5	Severe neglect and inhumane treatment. An urgent situation that justifies an assertive response to protect the animal.	Potentially life-threatening risk present. Immediate intervention to decrease threat to the animal required (provide water, shelter).
4	Clear evidence of serious neglect and / or inhumane treatment (unless there is a medical explanation for the animal's condition). Prompt improvement required.	Dangerous situation developing. Prompt intervention required to decrease risk (e.g. provide water, shade, shelter, or bring indoors). Warn owner of risk and shelter requirements.
3	Indicators of neglect present. Timely assessment; correction of problems and/or monitoring of situation may be required.	Indicators of a potentially unsafe situation, depending on breed, time outdoors. Inform owner of risk and proper shelter requirements.
2	A lapse in care or discomfort may be present. Evaluate, and discuss concerns with owner. Recommend changes in animal husbandry practices, if needed.	Risk unlikely, but evaluate the situation, and if warranted, discuss your concerns and requirements for proper shelter with the owner.
≤ 1	No evidence of neglect based on scale (s) used	No evidence of risk

Disclaimer: The TACC score is intended to be a simple screening device for determining when neglect may be present, for prioritizing the investigation of reported animal cruelty cases, and as a system for investigative agencies to use to summarize their case experience. The TACC score is not intended to replace definitive assessment of any animal by a veterinarian or law enforcement agent. A low TACC score does not preclude a diagnosis of abuse, neglect, or a dog requiring veterinary care upon more careful examination of an animal and its living situation.

IV. Physical care scale

- 5 Terrible - extremely matted haircoat, prevents normal motion, interferes with vision, perineal areas irritated from soiling with trapped urine and feces. Hair coat essentially a single mat. Dog cannot be groomed without complete clipdown. Foreign material trapped in matted hair. Nails extremely overgrown into circles, may be penetrating pads, causing abnormal position of feet and make normal walking very difficult or uncomfortable. Collar or chain, if present, may be imbedded in dog's neck.
- 4 Poor - substantial matting in haircoat, large chunks of hair matted together that cannot be separated with a comb or brush. Occasional foreign material embedded in mats. Much of the hair will need to be clipped to remove mats. Long nails force feet into abnormal position and interfere with normal gait. Perineal soiling or irritation likely. Collar or chain, if present, may be extremely tight, abrading skin.
- 3 Borderline - numerous mats present in hair, but dog can still be groomed without a total clip down. No significant perineal soiling or irritation from waste caught in matted hair. Nails are overdue for a trim and long enough to cause dog to alter gait when it walks. Collar or chain, if present, may be snug and rubbing off neck hair.
- 2 Lapsed - haircoat may be somewhat dirty or have a few mats present that are easily removed. Remainder of coat can easily be brushed or combed. Nails in need of a trim. Collar or chain, if present, fits comfortably.
- 1 Adequate - dog clean, hair of normal length for the breed, and hair can easily be brushed or combed. Nails do not touch the floor, or barely contact the floor. Collar or chain, if present, fits comfortably.

All of the listed conditions do not need to be present in order to include a dog in a specific category. User should determine which category best describes a particular dog's condition. This scale is not meant for assessment of medical conditions, e.g., broken limb, that clearly indicate a need for veterinary attention.

Weather Safety Scale

Most state cruelty statutes impose a duty of care for providing proper shelter for an animal. For example, the Pennsylvania statute indicates that proper shelter must protect the animal against inclement weather and preserve the animal's body heat and keep it dry. The Rhode Island statute specifies that shelter must provide sufficient protection from the elements for the health and well being of the animal. Regardless of the specific wording, the main point of imposing a duty for proper shelter is to ensure that an animal can maintain normal body temperature, or thermal homeostasis. Thermal homeostasis occurs when there is a balance between heat load and heat dissipation. Heat load is the sum of environmental and metabolic heat.<sup>33</sup> Heatstroke occurs when heat load exceeds heat dissipation. Clinical signs of heat stroke occur when a dog's body temperature exceeds the species-specific critical threshold (>109° F, 43° C). Heat stroke is a multi-systemic disorder precipitated by generalized cellular necrosis. Disorders of acid-base balance and primary renal failure are common clinical sequelae. Even with aggressive immediate treatment, heat stroke may be fatal.

The typical case history of naturally occurring heatstroke in dogs often involves forced confinement to a hot environment, such as a parked car, or exercise.<sup>33-35</sup> In these high risk situations, a dog's body temperatures can exceed lethal levels in a matter of minutes. However, there have also been reports of pets suffering severe heat stroke in circumstances that appear to be low risk, including walking with their owner on a hot day,<sup>36</sup> exposure to direct sun through the window of a car while riding with their owner,<sup>37</sup> or even a heavy coated dog walking with its owner on an apparently cool evening.<sup>38</sup> In a review of 42 canine cases, exercise was a factor in 45%, 28% were confined in a closed environment, and 19% were just exposed to a warm environment.<sup>34</sup>

Dogs cool themselves primarily through panting, which increases heat loss from the respiratory epithelium in the lungs and nasal turbinates. Therefore, dogs with a brachycephalic conformation have lower heat tolerance than dogs that are phenotypically less extreme. In general, dogs are much more sensitive to heat stresses than cold stresses, and have a much lower temperature comfort range than humans.<sup>a</sup>

There are size-related differences in heat and cold tolerance as well. Large dogs have more difficulty radiating heat than small dogs, whereas smaller dogs have more problems conserving heat.<sup>39</sup> Large breed dogs with a tendency towards brachycephalic conformation, such as the St. Bernard, may be at very high risk.<sup>c</sup> Hypothermia occurs when an animal is unable to conserve heat. In general, dogs are better able to withstand cold stresses than heat stresses. The first line of defense is a normal hair coat. Therefore, if the animal is exposed to sleet or rain in cold temperatures and becomes wet, it can compromise the substantial natural protective ability of a dry coat. In conjunction with exercise or high ambient temperature, a heavy hair coat, coupled with large size or obesity, can contribute to a rapid increase in body heat. Exposure to direct sun and inability to reach shade will greatly increase risk, even at temperatures a person might consider comfortable. Experimentally, lack of water in conjunction with high external temperatures has been shown to exacerbate the situation by expediting dehydration, circulatory collapse, and shock.<sup>40</sup> Thus, a dog may be susceptible to heat stroke under conditions that might not be uncomfortable, much less life threatening, for humans. Therefore, it is advisable to err on the side of caution when evaluating the risk of heat exposure for dogs. Small mistakes with heat may cost a dog its life, whereas dogs subjected to cold temperatures may be uncomfortable if they are not acclimated, but the experience is much less likely to prove fatal.

Weather safety indices have been developed as tools to determine when it is safe to ship livestock.<sup>41</sup> The weather safety scale developed here takes into account the greater heat sensitivity and cold tolerance among breeds with heavy hair coats, compared with short-haired breeds. There is precedent for establishing differential safe temperatures based on dog hair coat and phenotype. For example, the guidelines published by the International Air Transport Association (IATA) for air transport of dogs and other species indicate that the minimum and maximum temperatures for journeys of > 30 minutes duration are 50–75° F for brachycephalic dogs, 40–80° F for long-haired dogs, and 50–90° F for short-haired dogs.<sup>42</sup> Heating and ventilation systems may vary among aircraft, animal holding areas may be at ambient temperature, and temperatures on the tarmac may exceed ambient temperatures. Northwest Airlines has more stringent criteria, and will not transport a dog if the ambient temperature is above 85° F or below 10° F for any amount of time.<sup>d</sup> The animal welfare act specifies that, for dogs whose care is regulated by the act, ambient temperatures must not fall below 45° F nor rise above 85° F for more than 4 consecutive hours in indoor housing or holding facilities, or for more than 45 minutes while being moved to or from a primary conveyance or a terminal facility. A lower limit of 50° F is specified for short haired dogs, for dogs not acclimated to lower temperatures, and for young or aged dogs. Also, dry bedding and other methods of conserving body heat must be provided when temperatures fall below 50° F.<sup>43</sup>

The weather safety index developed here (Appendix, Scale 2) is based on the limits indicated above regulations, and takes into account a dog's size, age, phenotype, the availability of water, and exposure to direct sunlight when evaluating the effect of temperature. In order to use this scale, the best estimate of the temperature that the dog is exposed to in whatever shelter is available, should be used. For example, the fact that a dog is indoors may be irrelevant if the environment does not allow the animal to maintain thermal homeostasis (e.g. in a garage or shed). Similarly, a dog that has access to a well constructed dog house with thick bedding may be able to maintain thermal homeostasis even though it is outdoors during winter months.

Environmental Health Scale

In the environmental health scale (Appendix, Scale 3), the kennel, pen, yard, cage, barn, room, tie-out, or other area where the animal is confined or spends the majority of its time is evaluated for the presence of feces and urine, clutter, trash, and debris. An owner's duty to provide an environment that is sanitary, comfortable, and safe may be explicitly stated in cruelty statutes, or be implicit in the general duty to provide proper shelter. For example, the cruelty statute in Maine specifies a duty to provide humanely clean conditions, in Maryland it specifically includes a duty to provide proper air and space, in Michigan it specifically prohibits overcrowding, and in Minnesota and Ohio it imposes a duty for providing proper air. Massachusetts requires a sanitary environment. The Michigan statute specifically defines sanitary conditions as "free from health hazards including excessive animal waste or other conditions that endanger an animal's health." Common sense suggests that unsanitary conditions can predispose to skin infections and other diseases, and make the dog uncomfortable. Debris and trash can inhibit normal movement, and be dangerous to the animal if there are sharp edges or protrusions that can catch a collar or chain.

Physical Care Scale

A scale for evaluating the condition of the dog's coat and nails to determine if there evidence of neglect is shown in Appendix, Scale 4. Existing cruelty laws do not impose a specific duty to groom a dog. However, allowing a dog to become heavily matted or develop overgrown nails is in conflict with prohibitions against causing unnecessary pain or suffering, and with statutes requiring a normal standard of care. The development of pure breed dogs has resulted in some coat types that require periodic grooming by humans in order to maintain the health and well being of the dog. Such a duty of care is implicit in the prohibition against causing unnecessary suffering. Dogs with these types of coats are unable to adequately self-groom, and failure to provide such grooming eventually results in heavy matting. A heavily matted dog is under extreme discomfort because of the tension on its skin, interference with normal mobility, inability to relieve any discomfort or irritation by scratching or self grooming, and irritation from embedded foreign material, external fecal impaction, and urine scald. Such a condition will make external parasite control impossible. It is not uncommon for fecal impaction in the perineal hair to lead to maggot infection of the flesh in the perineal region.

In the natural state, a dog's nails are kept short through the course of normal movement. However, many domestic pets, particularly those that are confined for extended periods and receive little exercise, require periodic nail trimming. When extreme, overgrown nails can penetrate the footpad, causing pain, lameness, and possibly infection, and force the feet into an unnatural position, causing gait alterations and discomfort.

Interpreting the TACC Score

The TACC score is intended to be a simple, easy to use objective screening tool for evaluating neglect of both individual and multiple animals. It is also intended as a tool for field agents to determine the urgency of evaluation and intervention for an animal, much like the Apgar score used to quickly assess vital status in newborn infants (and recently modified for evaluating neonatal foals).<sup>44</sup> The TACC system may be used by either veterinarians or trained non-veterinarians, including animal control officers, cruelty investigators, and police. It is designed to be useful over a broad range of environmental conditions, and to take into account differences in tolerance for temperature extremes among different ages and breeds. The interpretation of the TACC score is described in the appendix.

When multiple scales are used to obtain a TACC score, a dog whose care or condition is sub-optimal in multiple areas is at greater risk of neglect than a dog with the same degree of neglect in only one area. For example, a malnourished dog will be less tolerant of environmental stress than a well nourished dog of normal body weight, as will a dog whose thermoregulation is impaired by a dirty, heavily matted coat.

Disclaimer and Limitations

The information presented here regarding individual state cruelty statutes is intended only to illustrate points raised in the text. Anyone working with animal cruelty cases must review the laws in their own state on a regular basis to be aware of changes and to understand the laws in their full context.

The TACC score is intended to be a simple screening device for developing an index of suspicion that intentional or unintentional neglect may be present. A low TACC score does not preclude a diagnosis of abuse upon more careful examination of the animal and its living situation. For example, an indoor pet in good body condition with sanitary living conditions could still be at risk of many forms of mental and physical abuse. Similarly, a high TACC score indicates a strong suspicion of either acute or chronic neglect, although it is not necessarily pathognomonic for neglect, particularly if only one scale is used. However, if an animal receives a high TACC score on multiple scales, the probability of neglect is very likely.

The TACC score is not intended to replace definitive assessment of any animal's situation by a veterinarian or trained law enforcement agent. However, we believe that the TACC system is useful for initial screening of a dog that may be in danger and prioritizing reports of neglect for definitive assessment. It may also be useful for quantifying the degree of neglect, when a determination of neglect is made. Because it is based on objective standards, it hopefully will remove much of the subjectivity that has made evaluating cases of animal abuse so challenging.

- 28a.8. Flooring.
- 28a.9. Scope and Effective Date.

§ 28a.1. Definitions.

The following words and terms, when used in this chapter have the following meanings, unless the context clearly indicated otherwise.

ANSI/U.L. Standard 2034 and IAS 6-96 – Independent laboratory testing standards for carbon monoxide detectors.

Circulation or circulated air – The air that is mixed within a room and typically provides heating and cooling.

Commercial kennel – A kennel that breeds or whelps dogs and (1) Sells or transfers any dog to a dealer or pet shop kennel or (2) Sells or transfers more than 60 dogs per calendar year.

Cubic Feet per Minute or CFM – A measurement of the flow of a gas or liquid that indicates how much volume in cubic feet pass by a stationary point in one minute.

Diurnal light cycle - The daily lighting cycle provided by artificial or natural light or both which shall be twelve hours of light and twelve hours without light. The twelve hours of light shall coincide with and be provided during normal daylight hours.

Excessive light—Direct, undiffused light from either the sun or artificial light, such as from a lighting fixture of an intensity that is twelve foot candles or more greater than the maximum footcandles of light required by this chapter, which is placed or directed in a manner such that the light is allowed to or is shining directly into a primary enclosure of a dog.

Fresh Air Ventilation – That portion of circulated air that is from the outdoors.

Full-spectrum lighting - Full-spectrum light is light that covers the electromagnetic spectrum from infrared through near-ultraviolet, or all wavelengths that are useful to plant or animal life; in particular, sunlight is considered full spectrum, even though the solar spectral distribution reaching Earth changes with time of day, latitude, and atmospheric conditions. When applied to an electrical light bulb the term implies the product emulates natural light.

Heat Index (HI) or Temperature and Humidity Index (THI) - An index, published by the United States National Weather Service, that combines air temperature and relative humidity to determine the human-perceived equivalent temperature. Heat index values are calculated based on temperature measurements taken in the shade. Exposure to full sunshine can increase index values by up to fifteen degrees Fahrenheit (15 F) and strong winds carrying very hot, dry air will add heat to the body. (United States National Weather Service).

Mechanical ventilation—Ventilation produced by operation of a machine. So long as its operation results in compliance with the standards established in this chapter, a mechanical ventilation system may range from very basic, such as an exhaust fan, to more sophisticated systems such as a HVAC system with temperature and humidity controls.

Primary enclosure—

(i) The primary structure that restricts a dog's ability to move in a limited amount of space, such as a room, cage or compartment.

(ii) The term does not include a run described in section 207(i)(6) of the act (3 P.S. § 459-207(i)(6)).

Professional engineer—

(i) An individual licensed and registered under the Engineer, Land Surveyor and Geologist Registration Law (63 P. S. §§ 148--158.2) or a successor statute to engage in the practice of engineering.

(ii) The term does not include a person who is exempt from licensure and registration under section 5(b) of the Engineer, Land Surveyor and Geologist Registration Law (63 P.S. § 152(b)).

Ventilation or ventilating – The process of "changing" or replacing air in any space to control temperature and humidity or remove moisture, odors, smoke, heat, dust, airborne bacteria, carbon monoxide, carbon dioxide, and to replenish oxygen. Ventilation includes both the exchange of air to the outside as well as circulation of air within the building. Ventilation is used to remove unpleasant smells and excessive moisture, introduce outside air and to keep interior building air circulating, to prevent stagnation of the interior air.

§ 28a.2. Ventilation.

[Proper ventilation helps ensure that dogs are healthy and not stressed.]

(a) General Requirements: Each area of [the] a commercial kennel and commercial kennel housing facility where a dog[s] [are] is housed, kept or present, including primary enclosures, [must] shall utilize a functional, mechanical ventilation system that provides ventilation [to] in a manner that [satisfy] meets the requirements of this section and sections 28a.3, 28a.4, 28a.5 and 28a.6 of this Chapter. The kennel owner or operator shall assure the mechanical ventilation system is functional, in operation at all times and meets the standards and requirements of this section. The kennel owner or operator shall also assure the auxiliary ventilation system, humidity control system and carbon monoxide detectors are functional, operational and operated or operating in a manner that meets the standards and requirements of this section and sections 28a.3, 28a.4, 28a.5 and 28a.6 of this Chapter.

(b) Certification of ventilation system - The kennel owner shall supply the following information to the Department:

(1) Written Certification under the signature and seal of a professional engineer verifying the professional engineer has inspected the ventilation system to be certified, acknowledging familiarity with the requirements of the Dog Law and this chapter and certifying that the ventilation system of the kennel meets all of the standards and requirements of this section and sections 28a.3, 28a.4, 28a.5 and 28a.6 of this Chapter. In addition, the certification shall contain the following information:

(i) The total cubic feet of the kennel and kennel housing facility, and the cubic feet of each separate room or area of the kennel and kennel housing facility where a dog is kept, housed or present.

(ii) A description of the mechanical ventilation equipment to be utilized in each room or area of the kennel and kennel housing facility where a dog is kept, housed or present, including primary enclosures. The description shall include the cubic feet per minute capacity of that equipment.

(iii) A description of the humidity control system, devices or equipment to be utilized, including the total capacity of the system, devices or equipment.

(iv) A description of the auxiliary ventilation system, devices or equipment to be utilized.

(v) The highest total number of dogs that will be kept, held or present in the kennel and kennel housing facility, including primary enclosures, at any time.

(vi) The location where each and every device for measuring temperature and humidity required by section 28a.4(b)(1) should be installed in order to accurately measure temperature and humidity as required by this chapter in each area and room within the kennel and kennel housing facility where a dog is housed, kept or present, including primary enclosures.

(2) The certification shall be submitted to the Department by May 30, 2011, for all commercial kennels licensed as of that date, and thereafter, the certification shall be submitted as part of all commercial kennel license applications; and within 90 days of any change to the volume, cubic feet or linear dimensions of the kennel housing facility where a dog is kept, housed or present, including primary enclosures, a change in the highest total number of dogs kept, held or present, or a change to the volumetric, capacity, circulation or air exchange portions of the ventilation system or a change in any part of the auxiliary ventilation or humidity control system.

(3) A new certification shall not be required for the submission of a commercial kennel license application, if the commercial kennel submitting the kennel license application was licensed in the previous year, submitted a valid certification in that year and there have been not changes to the volume, cubic feet or linear dimensions of the kennel or kennel classification since the submission of the last kennel license application and certification. In such an instance, the certification submitted with the most recent commercial kennel license application may be re-submitted.

(4) The information submitted to the Department shall be kept as part of the kennel's records.

(c) Inspection –

(1) Inspection: A State dog warden or other employee of the Department inspecting the kennel will at a minimum:

(i) Assure the mechanical ventilation system is functional, operational and in operation.

(ii) Assure the auxiliary ventilation system is available, functional and operational and, where the temperature in the kennel exceeds 85 degrees, that the auxiliary ventilation system is in operation.

(iii) Assure the humidity control system is available, functional and operational and operating or operated in a manner that meets the standards and requirements of section 28a.4 of this chapter.

(2) A State dog warden or other employee of the Department inspecting the kennel may take ventilation, temperature, humidity and ammonia level readings and measurements to assure compliance with this chapter.

(d) Recertification – The Department may require recertification by a professional engineer where the ventilation, auxiliary ventilation, humidity or ammonia levels or standards fail to comply with the requirements of this chapter.

(e) Ventilation and Circulation - Kennels and housing facilities where a dog is housed, kept or present, including primary enclosures, shall be equipped with mechanical ventilation equipment that physically moves air and can provide ventilation, fresh air ventilation, circulation, heating, dehumidification and filtration meeting the standards of this chapter. Such equipment includes: air handlers, roof top units, dehumidifiers, furnaces, unit heaters and heat pumps.

(f) Standards - The [following] standards established herein shall be met at all times that a dog is housed, kept or present in the kennel or kennel housing facility, including primary enclosures:

[(1) When the ambient air temperature is 85° F, a form of mechanical ventilation capable of reducing air temperature shall be utilized to reduce air temperature where dogs are present. If the ambient air temperature in any portion of the facility is 86° F or higher, despite mechanical ventilation utilized, dogs may not be present in those portions of the facility. This paragraph does not apply to outdoor exercise areas.

(2) When the temperature is 50—75° F, the relative humidity shall be in the range of 40—60%. The relative humidity shall be measured at standing shoulder level of 10% of the dogs in the kennel, randomly selected from all rooms. Relative humidity may not be measured in a primary enclosure within 30 minutes of the completion of active cleaning of that primary enclosure.

(3) When the temperature is above 75° F, the relative humidity shall be 1%—50%. The relative humidity shall be measured at standing shoulder level of 10% of the dogs in the kennel, randomly selected from all rooms. Relative humidity may not be measured in a primary enclosure within 30 minutes of the completion of active cleaning of that primary enclosure.

(4) Ammonia levels must be less than 10 ppm. The ammonia level shall be measured at shoulder level of dogs housed in the primary enclosure of 10% of the dogs in the kennel at standing shoulder height, randomly selected from all rooms, as well as on the floor of the four corners of the housing facility and at least one location on the floor along each wall of the facility. Ammonia in a primary enclosure may not be measured within 30 minutes of the completion of active cleaning of that primary enclosure.

(5) The means of ventilation employed must ensure that carbon monoxide (CO) levels are maintained below detectable levels in all areas of the kennel. Kennels shall install and maintain CO detectors with the ability to monitor the CO level throughout the entire facility. The detectors must meet or exceed the UL standard 2034 or the IAS 6-96 standard, or its successor standards.]

(1) General: Ventilation and circulation of air shall be provided and distributed throughout the entire area of the kennel and kennel housing facility, at the required volumetric rates and in the manner required by this chapter in all rooms or areas of the kennel and housing facility where a dog is housed, kept or present, including primary enclosures.

(2) Circulation and volumetric rates: Minimum circulation rates in each area or room of a kennel and housing facility, including primary enclosures, where a dog is housed, kept or present shall be maintained at all times at a total volumetric airflow of 100 cubic feet per minute (CFM) per dog. Volumetric air flow rates may be required to be increased as set forth in the Auxiliary Ventilation provisions of this Chapter.

(3) Design capacity: The mechanical ventilation equipment employed to physically circulate and move the air shall be designed, rated and able to circulate and move the required volume of air based on the highest total number of dogs held in the kennel and kennel housing facility, including primary enclosures, at any one time and shall do so in a manner meeting all requirements of this section.

(4) Fresh air rates: At least 30 CFM per dog of the circulated air shall be fresh air, the rest may be re-circulated air.

(5) Filtration: Filtration of circulated air shall be by disposable filters rated at a minimum efficiency reporting value (MERV) of 8 or higher.

(i) Evidence of the MERV filtration level shall be the information printed by the manufacturer on the filters.

(ii) At a minimum, filters shall be replaced quarterly in equipment serving areas of the kennel and kennel housing facility, including primary enclosures, that houses dogs.
