Dear EQB and DEP,

Please don't micromanage our state by putting restrictions on wood-fired boilers. They are not popular among the millions who live in the cities, and the few who use them are not destroying our forests or air quality.

The cost to enforce the regulations is something we can't afford, even if the economy were good. There are better and more important things to do with our money.

If there are fire hazards, then insurance companies and local fire marshals should be addressing the issue.

This sounds to me like an idea that a big-city politician would have, to get more popular with the people who live in big cities and control the vote: in other words, it sounds like a political trick to get elected which serves no real practical purpose and only serves to frustrate the hardworking people who are using natural means of survival.

Sincerely, Glenn Shrom
