The Department's proposed regulations would dramatically expand state control over personal medical decisions, school environments, and even agricultural products. They would convert the currently voluntary immunization registry into a near mandatory system (p. 24) and reinstate broad school-mitigation powers that could revive sweeping mandates like masking (pp. 206-207). More troubling still, they authorize intrusive contact-tracing entry into homes and schools (p. 210), allow private interactions and vaccination of minors without parental consent (pp. 210-211), broaden criteria for removing students from school (p. 236), eliminate longstanding religious treatment accommodations (p. 274), impose mandatory testing on all pregnant women (p. 275), and extend state authority to restrict animals and food products based on mere suspicion of contamination (pp. 288-289). These measures are a significant expansion of government overreach into families' rights, personal health care, and everyday life.

Mr. Shapiro. You MUST stop meddling in our daily lives. You cannot mandate to do something to our children without our knowledge. Mandatory testing for pregnant women is not your responsibility. That is between a woman and her dr. STOP what you are trying to do. These measures are a significant expansion of government overreach into families' rights, personal health care, and everyday life.
